Introduction:

Populism and populist politics has been a matter of academic and political concern across the world for some time. Whether in Latin America, the USA or in South Asia and the Middle East, the attendant perplexity around what makes populism work has led to significant scholarly interest in the theoretical and historical contours of populism. Left wing or right wing, the specific distinctiveness of articulating the ideological underpinnings of populism raises questions about its diverse and complex practices, rhetorics, institutional formations, mobilizing techniques and impact. The term has been used to describe leadership and aspiration across the political spectrum. While Trump and Corbyn have been heralded practitioners of populism, populism describes both the likes of Pato and the Hungarian dictator. It is one of those terminologies that has found easy circulation and interpretation with journalists and common readers alike. However, that has not reduced the "confusion and frustration" of attempts to understand the vagueness and fluidity that is often exhibited by the phenomenon and its conceptual application to contexts and politics. If at the core of populism is the invocation of a people and their apparent unmediated relationship with charismatic leadership, the question that remains who are the people in populism? How do we define populism in a way that can account for its economy across the political field? Further, the confusion between the popular and the populist produces all too common instances of misidentification.

Let alone research in India, internationally also, except the seminal work done by Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe, there is not enough study on the phenomenon of populism. One of the reasons for UGC to take up a project on populism was therefore not only the global interest in populism but specifically to explore the scope and possibilities of this populism in contemporary India. What is important is the remarkable combination of populism and authoritarianism and the speed with which both observe the arrival of democracy. A noteworthy mark of populism has been that there should be no intermediary between the people and the state, that the so-called representative institutions should act as a barrier between the people. The people, as the right wing would argue have the right to communicate directly with their leader, as per this will go, therefore the possible religious basis of populism since almost all religious across the world mandates a direct relationship between people and their god. Additionally, since populism entails a dismissal of the intermediaries between the people and constituent institutions; what are the strategies used by a populist leader to undermine institutional structures, and what is the nature of these structures? For instance, how have leaders such as Indira Gandhi, Jayalalithaa and Mamata Banerjee altered the structures of their own parties to become populist leaders? What does a Chief Minister does in her own political party is part of the process of undermining of structures of democratic governance? How are these structures replaced by another kind of structure which allows populist politics to continue and thrive? Given this one can ask how do historical, religious, familial and other sources to study the sources of populism questions can be raised about whether populism is an ensemble of practices – is there an ideological core to populism? What are the stakes involved in asking either of the two approaches? If populism is called an ideology, then one has to draw how it has historically evolved the shape of an ideology? At the onset of the research, a number of broad themes of research on populism were to be foregrounded that at the heart of political mobilisation is post-Larson study on state populism, institutions, populist parties and populist promises. How for instance does a political party once it forms government sustain its policies?

The year-long research project "Populism and Populist Politics in South Asia – with special emphasis on India" has examined some of these issues related to welfare policies, leadership, political strategies etc. It is noteworthy that in earlier project on Populist Movements in West Bengal and Bihar (2013-14) and a book-length publication from Popular Movements to Rebellion: The Naxalite Decade (Editor Ranabir Samaddar, Orient Blackswan & Routledge, 2018) the figures today's report in the article reflects and revises. Researchers were not diverted in any certain way—papers on the Kisanashree scheme in West Bengal, the Chittagong welfare programs, policies of the Aam Aadmi Party and Mamata Banerjee have fed to the study of recent across the board welfare programs of state governments reflecting a pattern of shift towards governance and state populism. We could then ask why populism becomes so crucial in governance as a modern day pre-requisite of governance.

In the course of the year, Calcutta Research Group has organized ten consultative planning meetings, four public lectures and an international conference. The target audience and contributors were intellectuals, youth, activists, researchers and scholars. Social scientists, political scientists, cultural studies and media researchers constituted the research collective and contributed through their participation in the discussions and publications. CRG has published two edited volumes in Hindi and Bengali and three Policies and Practices on the theme.

11:30 to 11:45 AM: Welcome Address: Sitaj Pratim Basu, CRC, Kolkata, Vidyasagar University.

The welcome address was delivered by Sitaj Pratim Basu. Following a brief welcome address to the participants of the Planning Meeting, Sitaj Pratim Basu introduced the first session on the general outline of the Problem on Population and Popular Politics in South Asia with Special Reference to India and welcomed the resource persons and participants attending the meeting.

11:45 to 12:15 AM: General Outline of Project

Chair: Subhas Raman Chakraborty, MCRG, Kolkata

Speakers

Ranabir Samaddar, MCRG, Kolkata & others

The session was moderated by Subhas Raman Chakraborty. He introduced Ranabir Samaddar as the lead discussant on the general outline of the project to be followed by inputs and discussions from all participants. Ranabir Samaddar started by giving a background of the Popular Movements project conducted by CRC during the years 2016-2018. The period of research covered the popular movements in India from the years 1981-1971. The popular movements research project and the publications that emerged from it form the background to the proposed research on populism. Samaddar specified that although the project would be designated for a period of one year, it would be preferable to continue the work beyond the given time period. He went on to take up and respond to the question, "Why is it important to work on populism in the present context?" Given that there are not enough Indian books on populism, the research has to begin by looking at what populism would mean internationally also except the research done by Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe there was not enough theoretical work on populism in particular left wing populism in specific which has been read widely by European English speaking left wing students and activists. Samaddar further spoke about how critiques of populist politics such as Gunn Sjöström characterise populism as a mode of politics where 'the' stands at the centre, or are troubled thereby dismissing the possibility overall of a left wing populism. One of the reasons therefore Samaddar argued for CRC to take up a project on populism was not so much to study the possibilities of left wing populism but given the global interest in populism to explore the shape and peculiarities of right wing populism in India. He further asked, is there therefore an organic connection between popular politics and populist politics in India? Is there something intrinsic in popular politics that develops into populist beliefs or in some sense a populist polity or a popular politics? What may be the case that popular politics developed in Bengal and metamorphosed it in the radical politics of the 1980s and 1990s, or on the other hand Bihar emerged as a site of populist politics during the time of JD Sarakar, there is some kind of amnesia which has prevented the study of populism in both the colonial and postcolonial times, simultaneously showing that there may be discontinuities between the two. Samaddar argued that Marx stated during his time that it was then that the world in some sense was experiencing populism for the first time. People have also commented on Lenin's oscillating attitude towards populism. Banmukhi went on to comment on the Russian and Argentinian leftists and their historical relationship with populism and populist politics. He then turned to the South Asian instances of populism: coming first from Pakistan and the rise of the People's Party under Bhutto's leadership and then Pálal Hage's Argentine populism in Bengal and finally India. Gandhi's 16 point program in India. Samaddar further argued that the combination of anti-colonialism and populism has been remarkable and that populism has been highly suspicious of the ways in which democracy moves. The significant mark of populism has been that there should be no intermediary between the people and the state, that the so-called representative institutions do not represent people. The people therefore as the right wing would say have the right to communicate directly with god. Samaddar then pointed to the possible religious basis of populism since almost all religions across the world mandate a direct relationship between people and their god. Popular movements on the other hand have shown a considerable distrust with popular leaders, and several prior researchers from CRC have worked on this. The innate suspicion then of the middle vegetative of representation is something that connects popular movements and populism. One of the approaches that for populism would be to study in theoretical contexts, while the other would be to take India's historical approach. Samaddar asked if it would then be important to go back to the history of popular movements and study populist factions and the ways of mobilising people. Another question that then can be raised about whether populism is an ensemble of practices, or is there an ideological core to populism? What are the kinds of stakes in taking either of the two approaches. If populism is called an ideology, then one has to show how it has historically taken the shape of an ideology.<sup>10</sup> On the other hand one can draw on historical, religious, familial and other sources to study the patterns of populism.<sup>11</sup> Then one can look at the boundary of these sets of practices and turn them as populism. Therefore, it is irrelevant whether populism can be used by the right wing or the left wing. What is more important especially for the project would be to identify these basic set of practices etc. The project at this point is open to either of these routes being taken.

towards the study of populism. Samaddar stated that at least three research papers would be produced from the project. One of the primary aspects to study would be the trajectories of populism in South Asia and a general background to the contemporary or present history of populism in South Asia. He pointed out that an important element that needed to be looked at had to do with what is said about populist governments in West Bengal, Tamil Nadu, Karnataka or Bihar etc. Samaddar pointed out that these concerns were the basis for Sumanta Dasgupta being invited to work in his research in AAP in Delhi. He insisted that instead of looking at the one year time period as a limitation researchers should approach the problematics of populism in more temporal terms. Sibdas Raychaudhury, a moderator of the session, summed up the main points that the panel covered: left wing movements, personalities, practices, material bases of the variety of populism etc. Following this, the session was opened up to participants for discussion and their opinions.

Majid Islam agreed with Samaddar that there could be two broad themes of research on populism; that of the history of political mobilisation, and secondly a post-institutional kind of research on populism. He added that there was a need to look at some populism in a post-institutional context. This needs to be addressed in the ways in which a populist party, more often than government, sustains its politics. This is something that Lashau does not address at all. One could take the example of the Bijan Janata Dal, which survived in the 1990s, as well as the kind of policies practised by Mamata Banerjee in West Bengal. He further stressed that existing literature does not look at aspects of state populism. Majid Islam stated that one of the important understandings of populist scholars is that there is a dismissal of the intermediary institutions, the people and the constituent institutions. He went on to add another layer in term of the strategies that a populist leader uses to undermine intermediary structures and consequently the question remains what is the nature of these structures? For instance, what did Indira Gandhi do to her own party in order to become a populist leader? What then a chief minister does to her own political party is also part of the process of undermining of structures of democratic governments. How are these structures replaced by another kind of structure which allows bourgeois politics to continue and flourish? Samaddar responded to this that such an issue may be addressed through a study of the internal nature of the political parties that function in India. Majid Islam further added that one needs to look at other identities like narrative form of party structures in India and then look the contestations within them. Amit Prakash added to the discussion by citing Alain Badiou's notion of 'being-in-common'. Thus he went on to argue that one should look away from making value judgements about whether populist movements and politics are good or bad. But one should still address the critique that returns with populist politics. There is a time in democratic practice when something happens and the institutions collapse, and a direct association takes place in terms of the leadership and the constituents. Why does this happen? Is something that we need to address? Is there then something in the liberal script that gives rise to populism from the left, right or centre? He pointed to a second issue whereby a large amount of writing on populist politics is aware of raising about social movements. One also needs to look at the ways in which populism has challenged the liberal script. A third question: ~~What will be the consequences now along the way, that will the liberal script gained legitimacy if not through popular movements and if that is accepted then how do we go about defining populism?~~ Suman DasGupta talked about her thoughts on populism, especially beyond the existing value judgements. She asked what there is the difference between populism and popular movements? She wanted against the ~~anarchic tendencies~~ in the understanding and definition of populism. She mentioned four clusters of discourses which populism has been used which were populism as ideology (as already suggested by Samaddar), populism as an movement or organisation, populism as a policy orientation and populism as a form of communication or as a form of discursive politics. The notion of an unfairly advantaged elite vs the masses, remains at the centre of understandings of populist politics. In such a situation, the understandings of populism becomes too vague or amorphous. Likewise it is as a descriptive role will perhaps give populism an analytical significance which we would not otherwise get if we look at it in terms of only ideology. Suman DasGupta assessed on the need to look at populism in terms of practices and the fact that even within practice-oriented studies, the classic example of Dravida movement remains ununderstood. She used the Sri Lankan case and the one in Bangladesh as examples where the critical study of the practices of populism may be studied. The study of practices will be the only way in which one can understand if there is an ideological core to populism or if there is a continuity in terms of practices across political parties. Ruchira Govani asked questions about the nature of the ongoing project and whether it would derive from the study of popular collective movements. Her primary question was about the scope of the project and the time period he is focusing on. Visalakshi Sircar in his discussion took two cues from Samaddar's speech, firstly, that populism is an ensemble of practices and the suggestion that that ensemble is a form of communication. He went on to ask a question; whether there will be a time to think about the question of the project of populism in the sense if how a common sense language emerges in the project and the kind of political framing that happens in the private. He also gave the example of Sonwata, the women's magazine and the role it played in building a certain kind of a populist feminine feminist sense in the private space. He stated that although there was some kind of indeterminacy in the way that the word populism is used, the one critical uses where the thinking and use of the word populism is under studied is judicial populism. He gave instances of various judgment movements where we see a certain kind of return of material populism under conditions that we would otherwise not consider to be too progressive or liberal enough. In 2018 for instance three landmark judgements were passed in India decriminalising section 377 the criminalisation of Homosexual acts. The Shahnaaz Gill judgement which then raised the question of how the judiciary responds to the expectations that come in this way. He pointed to shifts in Public Interest Litigation (Supreme Court), questions about populism and the private or the familial space. Orink Sagar added that the private spaces are possibly ones with the least amount of intermediation so the pedagogical practices in the private spaces are more intimate and far less adversarial within the family space.

Amit Sen spoke about the possibility of defining populism as a ideology at the discursive level. While talking about populism as a set of practices or a movement it would be difficult to distinguish between what is a popular element and one that is because. He felt that it would be problematic to define populism as a set of practices because one would have to begin by making a distinction between the specific practices of the left movement and those of the right etc. Sen pointed out that the subversion of institutions was one of the most important aspects of populist politics but questions may be raised about whether these institutions actually worked or even if the governments could function. If one takes the government as a practice then the distinction between the popular and the populist would be blurred. What then is the basis of saying that intermediary institutions are being subverted more specifically under the populist regime? Amit Sen pointed out the need to understand that institutions have been subverted long back.

Kavita Mani Sangnani made a brief comment about the state of populist movements. He pointed out that the movements cited in the discussion were largely very local or regional and that there may be a need to go back to the earlier decades or centuries and think of populist movements that are national or transnational thereby extending beyond the regional. Sangnani's second point was about the specific nature of populist movements. Whether they are about language or identity or religion. How then does one analyse the idea of religion and how it becomes implicated in articulating state power. In doing so one acknowledges that religion has become a very important driving force in Indian politics.

Rajai Roy as the next speaker talked about how one can arrive at the difference between the ideology of a popular state and the ideology of a welfare state.

Ajay Ganta amply contributed to the discussion by focusing on policies and what makes them populist. Such policies always existed given that different kinds of populism always existed in India beginning from peasant populism. He added that populist politics has something to do with a certain kind of flexibilization of social hierarchies. Without a sociology of caste religion and region, there would not be much sense in talking about populism in the present context. The question to be asked then would be about how populist policies make flexible certain kinds of social hierarchies. Crayonised with a social psychology and political emotions are required to understand what is so fundamentally different about the current moment of populist movement. He suggested this will be a common focus of the project and be an integral contribution. The discussion then came to Somnath Adhikari who talked about the need to look at some of the populist accounts from the Wilsonian and primitivist mode. It would be relevant to understand how during the time religion does become an ideology Europe is used as an important example to understand the historical significance of religion and religious studies. What then constitutes religion? According to him it would be important to understand how religion and ideology feed in to each other and that would throw light on what is happening in the postcolonial times. One has to look at what emerges out of the dynamics between religious faith and ideology and how they articulate themselves. Mallikarjuna Bapat referred to welfare regimes in India as a form of populist regime. She talked about the works about Javadekar, Mamata etc that have settled right on how populist and welfare regimes go together. Mallikarjuna Bapat pointed out that the discussion on populist movements was limited primarily to a national level. He was however more concerned about Assam and other smaller areas where the movement is absolutely different from what is happening in the rest of India, where it is tending more towards identity. The multiplicity of movements in Assam, Mizoram and Manipur need to be understood. It would also be important if CRG commissionally discuss with effect writing a paper at least on one specific movement. Maruf Bhat pointed out as a singular confusion at the conceptual level in relation to the understanding of postcolonial populism can be regarded as an ideology or a set of discursive practices as discussed earlier. However one common theme in the Latin American approach is that it is a strategy of political mobilisation. So if it is a strategy of political mobilisation then should be taken in to account Ramon Samanil concluded the discussion with a few comments about the challenges facing such a research. It would entail taking all the points discussed in the session into account, one of which could be the varying scales of the different movements.

Discussant: Ajay Godhwani, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi

The post-lunch session entailed a discussion of the themes and ideas that the researchers involved in the project proposed to study and reflect upon.

Political Parties and Popular Politics in Contemporary India: Some Reflections in Detail Lecture 1/2

Suman DasGupta

Suman DasGupta's paper proposed to move away from a narrow leftist understanding of populism, to an ideology and focus which also resonates the most easily with an Indian context, namely any policy that is technocratic in nature and as such favours the economic person, particularly those in subordinate positions over the elite formally represented by large business and financial interests. She argued that the contrast between the people and élite in terms of ideologies, movements, policies, organisations is perhaps the only way the term populism can retain its analytical usefulness without getting bogged down in potential difficulties as the rightist populist movements often represent the (ideological) right of the lens whether it is authoritarian or democratic in its origin, whether it represents a movement or simply a democratic style. His presentation examined selected populist policies launched in contemporary India by a party that grew out of a popular movement against corruption namely the Aam Aadmi Party (AAP) which by its very motto creates an implicit contract between the "people" and the elite. By focusing on some of its key populist policies, DasGupta seeks to gain a deeper understanding of how a movement "for the people" transformed into a political party which will try to make policies that were seen to be pro "aam aadmi" and what this populism implies in terms of democracy decision-making and longer term impacts on the economic and political front.

Constitutional Populist Politics: Crisis of Democracy

Sitakanta Basu

In light of the recent scuffle between the forces of central intelligence—the CBI—and the State Police of West Bengal over the interrogation “arrest” at the Kolkata Commission of Police and the subsequent, named as ‘State Constitution of More Chittan’, Sitakanta Basu argued that a deep concern for the “rule of democratic institutions” was expressed all across the paper. Indeed the populist politics in South Asia in general and the last 2 years rule of Mamata in West Bengal (with popular programmes like “Kalyanikar” for Gil students, Sabujtali—cycles for students of backward classes like as Rs 2/kg through PDS schemes for peasants, folk artists, artisans, fishers, folk, Leavers, Mysouth Villages etc.) has pushed further the moral boundaries of conventional liberal democracy in such a way that it demands the insights and labour of critical economists to grasp adequately the meanings and ramifications of such policies which cannot be even fully comprehended in the spectacles of Ernesto Laclau alone. Such “new” policies also raises a host of questions = What are the limits of such politics? Does its failure ensure the return of traditional politics? Even if that happens, can the champions of traditional politics alter the contours of populist politics in its entirety?

Populism in a Comparative Discourse: Old Questions, New Answers

Kazi Ray

By undertaking a brief study of populist politics—reformism of the Public Distribution System and other programmes benefiting the poor—engaged in by the Bangla Small government in the state of Chhattisgarh between 2013 and 2019, and then went loss to the Congress in the Jharkhand state assembly election this paper will look at some of the following questions on the subject of population in Chhattisgarh and their implications. It raised the question as popular policies more likely to give rise to competitive bidding by the contending parties in a democracy? What is the difference between a popular measure and a welfare initiative? How does one draw a line between these two? Does it mean that only those welfare schemes are termed as "Popular" that are targeted to address the poor people's concerns? Also, what was the relationship between the Raman Singh government's so-called popular measures, and the growing threat of Maoist influence in the region?

The Kanyashree and Rupashree Schemes Under Anuradha Patnaik's Government

*Ria De**

Ria De proposed to study the ways in which gender is configured by the Mamata Banerjee government in West Bengal through two governmental schemes – the Kanyashree scheme that was introduced in 2015, and the Rupashree scheme which was rolled out last year. Both Kanyashree and Rupashree are conditional cash transfer schemes. In the first instance, the government promises an annual sum of Rs 1000 to its girl children below the age of 14, and a consolidated amount of Rs 25000 to women above the age of 18. In either case, whether the girls are above or below the age of 18, the condition remains that they should be unmarried and that their family income should be below Rs 15 lakhs per annum. In the second instance, the Rupashree scheme promises a sum of Rs 25000 for the marriage of women above the age of 18. What the Kanyashree scheme aims to enable the empowerment of women through education, Rupashree directly links women's lives to the question of marriage. Taking the Kanyashree and the Rupashree as possible case studies to understand the ways in which the story of gender is being related within a populist project. De proposed to study these in relation to the various other "Women's rights" governmental schemes in contemporary India. For instance, the Ran Bahadur Andolan, the various other schemes undertaken by the Ministry of Child and Women's Development, such as the National Database of Sex Offenders, the linking of women's medical histories to their Aadhar accounts as a means to control female foeticide etc. Given that the Kanyashree and Rupashree projects have very contradictory goals in terms of women's lives, one that posits education as a means to prevent child marriage while the other claims to ease the poor man's burden of marrying his daughter. De proposes to look into how they relate to more historical social problems related to women's lives and upsurges such as the entanglement of marriage and family with women's subjectivities and the position of education in opposition to them. How does one really address the problems raised by caste and patriarchy through such schemes? or Does this fact negotiate with it?

Discussion

Ajay Gudavarty began the discussion by stating that the policies being discussed are by themselves anti-populist. We have had always such policies since post-independence days – community development programmes, poverty eradication programmes. Why call them populist at all, he questioned. Populism would mean that these policies are invested in certain narratives; certain strategies of mobilization that are very distinct. Gudavarty suggested that to study these policies in themselves would not be enough; they would have to be placed in narratives of certain strategies, slogans, modes of communication, new kinds of faultlines, new kinds of polarizations and interrelations with other political parties. One must look at a range of variables, since one of the most significant aspects of populism is a heterogeneity. About DasGupta's paper, Gudavarty commented that both the AAP and the right-wing BJP's 'mobilisation' strategies were populist. Considering this, he suggested that it would be interesting to look at why the BJP is so antagonistic towards AAP, and the conflicts between the two. The notion of immediate direct democracy has its own complexities. In one interview Arvind Kejriwal himself admitted that his participation in the direct民主 where he was signing files sitting in the Parliament, ~~the~~ <sup>was</sup> a ~~political~~ <sup>political</sup> ~~action~~ <sup>action</sup> in Delhi. There is certain conflict and overlap of meanings when it comes to questions of populism. For example, when Kejriwal resigned after 49 days, many thought that he was being honest, but many viewed it as a dereliction of duty and responsibility. Populism thus involves no multiple meanings. Referencing Subrahmanyam Baetz's paper, Gudavarty reads it as delving into how populism works in the space between the regional and the national. In the Indian context, the spatial imagination has been very important regarding how democracy works. In a recent study conducted by the Azim Premji University on trust in institutions, it was found that most people have the least amount of trust on local institutions and place higher levels of trust in institutions that they have seen. The BJP has very successfully exploited this disconnect between the local, regional and the national one of the reasons why there is no opposition against them. Right-wing politics displays a better understanding of what can translate into a national discourse; a regional or a local one. Baetz's paper, Gudavarty claimed, would be able to sufficiently problematise the interrelations between populism and spatial politics. Drawing attention to Ravi Des's paper, Gudavarthy explained how policy framework itself has a right-wing polarising agenda and therefore, policy is not independent of this kind of thinking. Noting that it is being discussed all the policy frameworks of the Ranbir Singh government under discussion is about defining who is a citizen and who is eligible for a policy. Liberal notions of procedures have produced an exclusion and the right-wing is being very aggressive about these exclusions. Now looks at the policy structure of the right-wing one sees that it is open-ended. The principle on which the policy is implemented is never really finalised yet. For instance, the policy dealing with ownership of units states 'The BJP are conscious liberal university for exclusion but are also using that excuse to create new kinds of exclusion based on nationalism dynamics'. This again has a strange purchase for the subaltern because they were the ones who were excluded. To look at the populist policies in Odisha through the optics of exclusion would contribute to the paper greatly. Another question that the paper could explore suggests Gudavarthy is the relevance of the BJP in engaging with certain populists. Finally, with respect to Ravi Des's paper, he stated that though it was exploring a very generic that the links between gender and populism would have to be more explicitly discussed. The social content of the Kanyashree and Repashree schemes need to be studied. What kind of innovative initiatives are they really part of? One of the reasons behind the rise in women-centric schemes is that post-2000 we are witnessing the emergence of women as an independent constituency like caste, regional identity. Gudavarthy ended with the claim that populism in the Indian context is also about creating new social and political constellations, and how TDP/Hindutva their policies as in the triple minority issue, is nurturing the notion of who is a minority in India. Oishik Sircar responded to Ravi Des's presentation with suggestions on literature on state feminism, carceral feminism and on government feminism. He felt two issues offshoot of state feminism. Mdnil Islam commented that the popularity of Mamata Banerjee among the masses must be seen in the context of the large crisis of liberal democracy and that of neoliberalism. There was a continuity from the Congress regime and the Left Front regime. But during the Indo-US Global interregnum, there was a disruption of institutions and then the Left Front normalised it. It is when the CPI(M) was hegemonised by the neo-liberal economy that Mamata's popularity began to rise. It is with such populist policies like Kanyashree and Repashree, as it is suggested that her popularity is sustained. I am going to ask, but how the degree of identification with the populist leader varies with different categories of women. The tank of intermediaries supports her popularity. Amit Prakash raised the issue of how identity, which is relevant to the question of populism often gets couched only in economic terms. Nayantara Chaudhury stressed on the need to establish some framework about the parameters of what is populist policy, what is a welfare scheme, and what is populism. She also expressed her discomfort with the plutocratic crisis of democracy. About the Chittagong question Chaudhury commented that the term period becomes important. This is because when a government comes back to power for three consecutive terms, there are chances of policies becoming populist. The evolution types of these populist narratives must be studied carefully. When the policies transform like then they take on a populist character. Finally, regarding Ria De's presentation, she emphasized that in viewing the Kanyashree and Rupashree schemes as populist one stands a chance of neglecting the way in which they have benefited the masses.

04.00 pm- 5.00 pm Discussion on Publications

Discussant: Poulomi Banerjee, Sanskruti College and University and MCRG, Kolkata

The final session of the day involved a discussion on the possible modes of publications on populism. The discussant Paula Banerjee of the Sanskruti College and University, Kolkata and MCRG, Kolkata stated that gender is an important factor that needs to be taken into consideration for CRG's current project on populism. Given that one of the proposed abstracts on populism by a staff member already raises questions about the ways in which gender and women in particular are mobilised by populist policies in West Bengal, CRG will work on a reader on populism where one of the ultimate sections would be dedicated to research articles on gender. Paula Banerjee further suggested the possibility of a reader on populism similar to the one produced by MCRG for the Popular Movements project titled From Popular Movements to Resistance. The Feminist Debate Site also stressed the need for a dedicated section on "gender and populism". She added that at least four publications on populism may be published in the Political and Practice series, including those by two half-researchers and two contracted researchers. She added that CRG must explore the scope of non-traditional forms of publications such as web publishing, video-journalism, post casts, webinars etc. where short form and current deliberations on populism may be regularly published and updated. While adding to Paula Banerjee's suggestions, Rishabh Srivastava from CRG talked about CRG's existing association with popular journals in particular Society, Politics and Practices of translating CRG publications into Hindi for wider circulation and dissemination. He then suggested that the scope of public writing and circulation in the form of newspaper articles, Hindi translations, contributions to the journal Amaravati. Panels can also be explored. Following the opening up of the discussion to other participants of the session, possible themes of research in relation to populism and populist politics were suggested. Maitri Islam committed to contributing a paper on populism. Oshik Sircar from OP India suggested themes such as private space and populism, populism and the university, journalism and judicial populism all of which were found to be important for the current consideration on populism. Sanaddat suggested CRC engage with how populism has been represented in the popular domain and thereby look at the integral relationship between the popular and populist trajectories of Indian populism etc. A plan was made for CRC to contact interested contributors for articles for the proposed reader. Balwteez Kaur Singh finalised a deadline of two months i.e. till end-May to acquire 1000-word abstracts from interested contributors. Participants proposed the possibility of liaisons with law institutes and legal scholars who could contribute to the research theme on "Judicial Populism". Oshik Sircar agreed to work towards connecting legal scholars and publications towards finding interested contributors for the theme of judicial populism. The possibilities of institutional collaboration between MCSC and TISS, Jamia Millia Islamia, JNU, Sapru Nanda College for Women, FRIA, OP India and Bastian University were discussed with pain-points of respective affiliations. Maitri Islam, Monirul Islam, Amit Peakash and Ajay Godavarty Madhumita Basu, Sonoma DasGupta, Oshik Sircar and Paul Balwteez Kaur Singh agreed to set up liaisons between CRC and their respective institutions towards mainstreaming different modes of intellectual collaborations such as conferences, workshops, public lectures, extension lectures etc. The issues of intellectual and logistical contributions from each of these institutions was also deliberated upon. Sanaddat stated that it would be very impactful if keeping in mind the upcoming national elections, CRC could connect SPW to host a special issue on contemporary populist policies. Further, journals such as Santati and the Routledge Indian Law Review were suggested by participants as possible platforms for publications on the Populism project.

Populism as a Conservative Liberal Scourge: Reflections on Politics and Policy in India

Amit Deka

Liberalism has been used as a framework for organising the political process while promoting individual rights, liberty and equality of citizens. Alongside liberalism may also be seen as a set of promissory notes emerging from a complexly negotiated social contract in each society, the intricacies of which have been underlined by the subsequent critique that it has found the world over. However, liberalism has also been characterised by a set of broken promises under the conditions of contemporary finance capital, leaving legitimate democratic concerns — above increased participation, better deliberation or proportionate equity for all sections. Populism speaks to such belied expectations and confirms the trope of a homogeneous popular will — without any opposition, with promises to deliver on these belied promises. The import of such populist political process is complex and far-reaching — from institutional ossification to the DNA of finance capitalism and, rising socio-political expectations to the rise of increasing inequality. Research on populism has been conducted within the broad contours of the discipline of Political Science with little focus in cognate disciplines. Consequently, understanding of the processes that undergird populist invasions are not fully understood, least in the case of India. For instance, how does the neoliberal macroeconomic conditions for the rise and growth of populism or how do both together impact social structures. How does the interplay between Information technology, Finance capital and those of liberalism colonise the political space to create conditions for the emergence and growth of populism and its implications (softline) local project? The paper will examine some of these issues with the help of Indian material (drawn from recent political narrative at the national level). To be able to examine the large phenomenon and to induce some collective and ameliorous policies and policy debates on selected areas will be the main focus.

Mamta K. Jha

In the present paper, I am proposing to examine populism as political practice, the practice that invokes the idea of social justice through insularities of caste. The ideal of the Indian Constitution and demands of liberal democracy that shaped post-colonial Indian politics witnessed the evolution of populism in dynamic yet diverse forms. The substances could be observed, maintained and assessed in different tellent units in very many ways. The ideological underpinning of populism engages with its idioms and phrases, various institutional formations, mobilizing techniques, import etc. In this paper, however, I am looking at populism at city in the rural heartland of general and in the state of Bihar, in particular. Apart from what do we mean by populism and how do we examine the practice of politics in the realm of populism the paper primarily engages with the idea of communal (social Justice) that dominated the tapestry of populism in the states under discussion. What has been the affirmation and manifestation of social Justice and where does caste enter in this practice of politics? Conceptually and strategically it is non-elitist and attempts to bring disenfranchised masses. Let's look in the process of caste articulation the practice of inclusion and exclusion complicates the process. If one takes Ambedkar's idea of dealing with caste question and thereafter responding to Justice in historical terms, it would have meant annihilation; of caste. But did the social Justice articulation in the rural heartland at any point of time anticipated that? The answer is emphatic one. Instead preconceived the caste groups for mobilization and electoral support and thereby turning caste social and non-political. Has this been a jocular and conscious decision and informed by the pragmatism that populism seems to value. The language, tone, idiom, idioms, phrases and idioms used since the time of articulation for social justice in general and quota policies in particular by leading socialist leaders in late 1950s, the right that practice of populism took in the rural heartland navigated through tumultuous phases. How are we to appreciate this practice of politics through the prism of caste? How do we try to comprehend the ideas, strategies and outcome of such populism? To grasp the inception and trajectory of the contours of populism in rural heartland, it is prudent to position one's engagement within a chronic framework. Yet, the present paper would take a risk to traverse from the past to the contemporaneity so as to understand the politics and shifts in a nuanced manner.

Population distribution in Chhattisgarh Districts & Census Survey

Report No:

Chhattisgarh came into being in November 2000 after it was separated from Madhya Pradesh. The state is tenth largest in area but its population is 25.5 million as per 2001 census, thus its population density is one of the lowest at 129 per sq km as against all India average of 362. With 44% of its land area under forest and vast mineral resources, Chhattisgarh is a resource-rich state. It ranks second in production of coal, ranks third in production of iron ore and there are large deposits of other minerals like bauxite, limestone etc. It is a power surplus state. It has good industrial base with steel plant, power plants, aluminum plant, cement factories and various other industries. Though it is known as a rice basin, its agricultural activities are by and large restricted to cultivation of pulses mostly mung bean (As Per Statement of the Finances of the State of Chhattisgarh 15th Finance Commission). Thus, despite having a sound economic base and cultivable land to people here, 46.3% population of Chhattisgarh were below poverty line as against national average of 27.5%. In other words of the total population of 25.5 million there were 12.19 million poor people in the state (Chhattisgarh Economic and Human Development Indicators (EDB) since the yield from farming was never enough to sustain them throughout the year a significant number of farmers used to migrate to other areas in unskilled and semi skilled labourers and gradually they became known as Bihaspuri coolies. In December 2003 Bipin Verma, the elected in Chhattisgarh and Raman Singh became the chief minister. Next year with the introduction of Chhattisgarh Public Distribution System (Circular Order 1004), Raman Singh started actively reforming the PDS of the state. Before that Fair Price Shops were mostly run by private owners and people were not getting even what was officially allocated to them. With that order Karmal Singh cancelled license of all private fair Price Shops (FPS) and initiated over the responsibility of running that to cooperative societies, gram panchayats, women's self help groups, primary credit cooperative societies and forest protection groups. He increased the number of FPS from 8492 to 10465. With the introduction of end to end computerisation the government could monitor the PDS system and bring transparency. While effort was made to recall all the miscreants by setting up one FPS in every gram Panchayat, the village committees were encouraged to monitor the distribution to plug pilferage. In fact all gram panchayats were engaged in keeping a strict tab over the process of PDS. On the other hand the government started buying paddy directly from the farmers and not encouraging the middlemen to run the show. Through the PDS the government had tried to give free at the rate of Rs. 1000 lakh BPL families and at the rate of Rs. 1 to another 7 lakh Aam Aadmi families. As a result of that people of Chhattisgarh started finally calling Karam Singh Chhatar wala Baba. One who gives rice. One could argue this role of Amadhan coupled with other populist measures pursued by him helped Raman Singh rule the state for three consecutive terms. Raman Singh even aimed with his reform of PDS programme not merely through bureaucratism but he actively mobilised people around it. By handing over the running of PDS to Panchayat and other local bodies and giving them responsibility of monitoring the supply and distribution of ration he made them stakeholders. Thus a parallel system was created so the bureaucrats on whom which eventually made the delivery system smooth and fulfilled. Just like this Raman Singh Food Security Programme preceded that of Janata's Food Security Bill. It should be mentioned here that the Raman Singh government did not stop at reforming the PDS only but it also reformed some other populist programmes discussed in the year. Yet in 2014 state assembly election Raman Singh and his party were swept out of power by Congress. Questions might be raised that the populist measures that kept him in power for 13 years might have lost their edge. But the government run PDS system after the reform proved to be most efficient transparent and people-friendly one as acknowledged by Jean Dreze and others. So we need to look for the answer elsewhere. After he returned to power for third consecutive term Raman Singh tried to make his much lauded food security programme more attractive by adding additional values. The state government started giving grams and kothri muktiya ration card holders free. Also, he announced a scheme under which around 15 lakh rural people would be given free mobile. But the Congress came back with a promise of complete waiver of debts to the farmers. It is too early to say that it was the main factor that saw Chhat Wala Baba defeated in the elections and finally ousted in the election. But if it is discussed in the post mortem of recent Chhattisgarh election then we are faced with another question: Is populist politics more likely to give rise to competitive bidding by the competing parties in a democracy? If so, then in a parliamentary democracy especially as it is unfolding in India, the prospect of the end of ideology based politics is highly remote and to be replaced by the populist politics, soon. Whether the parties of Left Right and Centre are genuine ready to give up their class caste based politics and would try to address the issues dear to broad mass, especially poorer sections in the society and separation thereof needs to be accordingly to be seen. But if the present trend is any indication then the pressure on them to change their position is only growing. There is another problem that this paper would like to point out: What is the difference between a populist measure and a welfare initiative? How does one draw a line between these two? It cannot be denied that while welfare programmes have got moral approval of the society as a duty of the State towards its people the populist programmes initiated by the state have always evoked some consternation among the urban elites. It seems that the very word Populism has a derogatory meaning. According to Oxford Dictionary the word Populism means, "A Political approach that strives to appeal to ordinary people who feel that their concerns are disregarded by established elite groups". Does it mean that only those welfare schemes are tagged as 'Populist' that targeted to address the poor people's concerns?

The Kanyashree and Rupashree Schemes: Gender and its Implications for Popular Politics

Rita Datta

This research will study the ways in which gender is configured by the Mamata Banerjee government in West Bengal via two governmental schemes, the Kanyashree scheme that was introduced in 2013 and for which Mamata Banerjee won the UN Public Service Award in 2013 and the later Rupashree scheme which was rolled out last year. Both Kanyashree and Rupashree are conditional cash transfer schemes. In the first instance, the government processes an annual grant of Rs 1000 for girl children below the age of 18 and a consolidated amount of Rs 25,000 for women above the age of 18. In either case whether the girls are above or below the age of 18, the condition remains that they should be unmarried and that their family income should be below Rs 15 lakhs per annum. In the second instance, the Rupashree scheme promises a sum of Rs 25,000 to the marriage of women above the age of 18. While the Kanyashree scheme aims to enable the empowerment of women through education, Rupashree directly links women's lives to the question of marriage. Taking the Kanyashree and the Rupashree as possible case studies to understand the ways in which the issue of gender is being plotted within a popular project, I wish to study these in relation to the various other "women's rights" governmental schemes in contemporary India. For instance, the 'Beti Bachao Ayushman' the various other schemes undertaken by the Ministry of Child and Women Development such as the National Database of Sex Offenders, the linking of women's medical histories to their Aadhar accounts as a means to control female foeticide etc. Such a study would require one to look at what the scheme is claiming to achieve in terms of their impact on women's lives in general and in terms of a social transformation in general. What for instance is the basis of these schemes what is the relationship between the scheme and the social reality? What kinds of research goes in to the formulation of such monetary plan? Who is the constituency of the committee? It would then be interesting to look at the bureaucratic-administrative processes. Given that the Kangayam and Rupashree projects have very contradictory goals in terms of women's lives one that posits education as a means to prevent child marriage while the other claims to ease the poor man's burden of marrying his daughter, how do they relate to more historical social problems related to women's lives and upbringings such as the entanglement of marriage and family with women's subjectivities and the position of education in opposition to that? How does one really address the problem raised by caste and gender through such schemes or does it in fact negotiate with it?

Women, Democracy & Politics: Cases of Demands

Silaj Pratim Basu

The recent scuffle between the forces of central intelligence, the CBI and the State Police of West Bengal over the interrogation – arrest of the Kollam CPI and the subsequent ‘concern’ of State Constitution & Mater Quare Replainta – the Head of Kollam by the Chief Minister Mamata Banerjee and then holding of cabinet meeting in Shakespear office room beside the platform of CPI-M’s main party, did not shock a large number of people throughout the country. Mamata’s style of politics and administration once again consumed the prime times of national-regional news channels, but the headlines of all the dailies and web & most popular in all form of social media – Facebook, WhatsApp and Twitter. In this nationwide discourse – apart from allegations and counter-allegations over the hyperactive CBI and the ‘zealous’ WB Police which detained the CBI officers and even temporarily besieged the latter’s office buildings – a deep concern for the ‘crisis of democratic institutions’ was also expressed. The ‘junta’ denied the killing of climate meetings and official programmes on street as the instances of supreme disrespect to the long cherished democratic norms and practices (in a recent editorial, India Today, Feb 2018).

while giving a left-handed compliment to Mamata's majoritarian politics over Modi's rightlessness has also treated it as 'decent' or 'democratic'. In recent history, we find a parallel of Mamata's downing in the air-attacks of Rafi Dasgupta, Delhi Lt. Governor's residence by the extent of the Aravali Removal in June 2018 along with some of his colleagues of the AAP government. One can also find somewhat similarity between the Janata Dalers of Kejriwal since 2014 and Mamata's holding of public Secretariat meetings in various parts of the state since he coming to office in 2011. But the latter has now become a regular affair which has generated tremendous enthusiasm and expectations in common masses especially in faraway districts from Kolkata but at the same time which has disturbed the formalistic mindset of top bureaucrat who generally like to rule Bengal from Kolkata. Many critics even gave a drama for Mamata popularity at the cost of impairment of bureaucracy and therein lowering down the values of an essential institution of the modern state, the bureaucracy. Indeed, the populist politics of South Asia in general and the last 7 years rule of Mamata in West Bengal with popular programmes like 'Kalyanikar' for anti-students Sabarimala - cycles for students in 'backward' classes treatment, job through POS schemes for peasants, folk artists, artisans, relief cash donations to youth, etc., has pushed further the sacred boundaries of conventional liberal democracy in such a way that it demands the rethinking and labeling of social scientists to grasp adequately the meanings and connotations of such policies which cannot be even fully comprehended by the spectators of Western culture alone. Such 'real' policies also raises a host of questions. What are the limits of such policies? Does it failure ensure the return of the 'traditional' politics? Even if that happens, will the champions of traditional politics abandon the contents of populist politics in entirety?

Economic Policies and Populist Politics in Contemporary India: Some Reflections in the Aftermath

Subrata DasGupta

There appears to be little definitional clarity around the term populism. Though the use of the term has proliferated in the last decade, its common practice now appears to be a pejorative connotation associated with mixed mixed views about how populism is connected with democracy and democratic institutions. In this paper we try to start from a wider understanding of populism as an ideology and stay with an understanding that resonates the most easily with an Indian context – namely any policy that is redistributive in nature and as such becomes the political petriol, particularly those in subordinate positions to the elite typically represented by large business and financial interests. The contrast between the people and elite in terms of strategies movements policies organization is perhaps the only way the term populism can retain its analytical usefulness without getting bogged down in potential discussions as to whether bourgeois movements policies represent the ideological right or left, whether it is authoritarian or democratic in its origin, whether it represents a movement or simply a discursive style. This presentation will examine selected populist policies launched in contemporary India by a party that grew out of a popular movement against corruption namely the Aam Aadmi Party (AAP) which by its very name creates a implied contrast between the "people" and the elite. By examining some of the key populist policies we seek to gain a deeper understanding of how a movement "for the people" transmuted into a political party which then had to make policies that were seen to be too "anti-elitist" and what this populism implies in terms of democratic decision making and longer term impacts on the economic and political front.

Introduction

The panel of scholars was introduced by Shiradda from Calcutta Research Group. Dr. Ray Chaudhury welcomed the welcome to the lectures on behalf of CRG and facilitated the panel discussion. The welcome address was given by Prasanta Ray, CRG who welcomed the room to both the public lectures and CRG and wished everyone a great stay in Kokkare for the weekend.

Following Ray, Kaubir Samaddar introduced CRG and the research project on populism that shaped the conference. Samaddar said, "CRG is 23 years old since it was founded. It was founded as a forum of public intellectuals, scholars, and activists of peace—issues connected with justice, more importantly, issues of migration and forced migration, development and democracy, gender and peace studies, starting from 1994. Issues of labor movement and history. While CRG is a membership-based body, there are several institutional multi-level CRG collaborations on various research themes. Some of them include orientation of postcolonial democracy, values of autonomy and justice in form and liberal democracies, interface of development and democratic citizenship and how migration shapes in the popular movements in Bengal and Bihar from the 1960s and 1970s. A recent book was published titled Populism, Migration and Reification of the Marginal Margins. About the theme of the present workshop, Prof. Samaddar said, "Populism has been used for everybody. Everybody seems to be a populist. For example, both Trump and Corbyn have been labelled as populist; both street protests in Paris and the Hungarian dictator are populists. The question then, Yestava—who are the people in populist? There are instances when we want to say populist and we say populist and vice-versa. The term has been used as to 150 years, however, let now we have to ask who is NOT a populist. He suggested that there is either something wrong with the definition, [populism] or something wrong with the idea of populism as prescribed to people."

On the research design at CRG on populism, Prof. Samaddar said, "In history Indira Gandhi, Faridul Haque, Sheikh Mujib emerge as classic instances for research on populism. Although pure theory has not attracted CRG in a big way, constraints of funding forced us to focus on a one-day conference." He laid two additional points around the theme of research covered in the conference that was to follow the public lecture.

First, researchers were not declared in any certain way—papers on Kanyashree Anna Dhanik and Chinnageedi welfare program were not planned but they all had to study at recent across the board welfare programs of state governments. Rather than asking why is it that the researcher is forced to ask about the state—goes beyond Lacau and others—why would activist populism becomes so crucial in governance in Ammodern day pre-requition of Democracy. Lacau speaks of populist reason however does not find any substantial idea about how does populist articulates his/her a way of managing society.

On other social theories on populism Prof Samaddar said "More in his engagement with populism in Russia had an ambivalent attitude. He was sure populism can avoid the evolutionary history of capitalism. He said, "It is perfectly possible that the populism of politics was something that the history of capitalism does not show." He spoke about Lenin's agrarian populism in Russia and Jackson & Roosevelt populism in the US.

He added that populism has developed as an important governmental practice over the past decades, and hoped that the conference can contribute in new dimensions of political thought.

His final point was on the notion of the people in populism: "Who are the 'people' in populism?" Ranajit Guha says the "people" signifies the popular, and not populist. Although subaltern scholars have given us a lot of work on populism in 20th century, there is a paradigmatic set of ideas on populism. While historians have attempted to understand populist responses from the lower classes, they have at the same time, tried to avoid class-based analysis in discourses on populism.

Following Ranabir Samaddar's introduction, the two speakers for the public lecture were introduced. Syed Ahsan Baigul, the first of two public lectures, is a current editor of Kosha Age. He was the Press Minister in the Bangladesh High Commission in London. He has written a biography of Sheikh Mujib in 2012, and has recently worked on Tarullin Ahmed. He frequently contributes to different papers in South Asia and was a fellow at AFDI, Delhi.

Immigration, Dispossession and Regime Politics

Syed Badruddin Ali

Mr. Alian began with an anecdote of how partition and ensuing humanitaires of postcolonial states in India and Bangladesh have shaped belonging and identity through a regime of passports and other documents of affiliation. He said, “the while there is public interest in history in present-day Bangladesh, history is also missing in the public discourse. His lecture focuses on the history of populism in Pakistan, Bangladesh and India, and in particular consisted of insightful examples of negative populism. The first example was the oil of garments by Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto after the 1967 Tashkeen Declaration. Mr. Alian argued that such negative populism remained till Bhutto's resignation in 1976. Another example was the Lahore resolution of 1940 where the two nation theory was popularized. Using the political history of East Pakistan and later Bangladesh during the late 1960s and throughout the 1970s, the lecture showed the complexities of Bangladeshi popular politics. Mr. Alian argued that Mian Mirza Bhutto's political career one that spanned three decades during the formation of the state of Bangladesh, was particularly “united for many lifetimes.” However, the Mianians throughout his eclectic political campaigns remained the populist figure of Bangladeshi politics. During early 1960s, during the formation of the Awami National League party in East Pakistan, Bhutto was its first President. In 1971 he adopted a leftist turn and critiqued the party on its affiliation of Western Capitalism. Mr. Alian argued that “Up to that point Bhutto's populism was very positive.” Later during the 1980s, Bhutto was in jail for the Agartala Conspiracy Case. When Bhutto proclaimed he would lead a million people in protest against Bhutto's arrest, Mr. Bhutto was released the next day by the state. The Mianians even withdrew their party from the elections of December 7, 1971 to help Sheikh Mujib-Di Rahman's Awami League obtain an absolute majority. Three days before the elections, on December 4, he declared East Pakistan a free country. However, soon after the formation of the new state; the Maulana caulked Majlis on his Indian and Western-oriented foreign policy and argued that "Bangladesh" should be independent of Delhi's constraints.

Mr. Ahsan said, "Bhashani was merciful; but he lived in a hut in a village, was at touch with the [ordinary] people. When Mufti started a one-party state, Bhashani was critical. But two months later, he told Moyib that 'what he was doing was great'." From these examples, this spanned the orbit of both Maulana Bhashani and the state of Bangladesh. Mr. Ahsan argued that "Populism becomes radicalized at times," and it becomes important to analyze the ends of negative and positive populism. How does one reconcile Kena's siding with Germany and Japan with his Indian nationalism? Similarly, in populist politics, of the Awami League "other political leaders of the Mujib-Nagan government—the government of Bangladesh in exile during the 1960s—were being ignored." Mr. Ahsan concluded his lecture by intersecting his discussion of populism with the changing notion of secularism, religion and Bengali identities in contemporary Bangladesh.

Problems of Current Populism

Badr Narayan Tiwari

Badr Narayan Tiwari, the second speaker, is a professor of anthropology at the GB Pant Social Science Institute, Allahabad. He is a cultural anthropologist and social historian and has undertaken various ethnographic projects focusing on marginalized peoples, social anthropology. He was previously at the University of Leiden, and an FOMS fellow of the Royal Tropical Institute Amsterdam. He has written on multiple books and chapters on Dalit history and mobilization as well as on saffron politics.

Tiwari began with the assertion that "Every politician is populist. Whether being a populist they cannot survive. Populism is a manipulative political selection from what is popular." He argued that "populists creates hope and produces fears" in the people. Through that, populist policies can sustain and work. This idea of populism is to create "new jama" as a purpose of populism; a new subject to rule. In cultural populism you need to connect with the people and create trust, [for which] you need a memory base to society. Those who are along slogan-based populism in India have a language that reaches the language of the people." He was reminded of an anecdote where a Congress leader mentioned that while the Congress has a history of over 150 years, the history that the RSS draws from spans 3000 years. They can use the metaphorical symbols and words that help in creating cultural populism. However Narayan argued that cultural populism cannot work alone in a political space. While "the RSS [presents] cultural populism the BJP propagates economic and social welfare programs targeted on paper at the poorest. Cultural and economic populism therefore are interdependent."

In the rest of his lecture, Narayan attempted to establish the idea of cultural populism and its interdependency with economic populism using examples from ethnographic fieldwork.

First, he analyzed the discourses of lectures in Bihar like CP or RSS workers. They all talk in the same language and same form. [We have to] explore where the form is coming from. They are from the most traditional Hindus. It is similar to defeating Dalit marchers earlier and the Bhagat Singh. He defined the workers as an essential part of village life in India. He finally alluded to how right-wing parties have been using the Kaviraj-style as a political communication strategy since the days of Martin Malhotra, Minyaya and Gutwalakar of the RSS. The second example came from his fieldwork in Bundelkhand CP where his research was among tribal communities. "Some of them have migrated from tribal forests to villages. When they migrated to the village, they brought their Devu with them. They want now a temple of their Devu." It was RSS that collected this that they wanted to make a temple and ensured its creation—which according to Narayan resulted in the creation of a loyal base of voters. This is a political strategy to "create identity through religious symbols."

Narayan connected his examples to argue that these political strategies can be termed politics through appropriation. From these examples he showed that the RSS is accommodating Dalit icons and marginalized voices in their narratives, and through that RSS is waging a cultural hegemony.

He analyzed the methods of populism as he concluded from his fieldwork. There are two ways for political mobilization. One process: resistance and dissent. The other is by appropriation—using the language of resistance. The frame is decided by them, the RSS, and you will be included in their frame. They are creating appropriation. RSS is working on Buddha Jayanti, celebrating BR Ambedkar. This appropriation as a method, comes to killing resistance. They are creating a condition where resistance does not submerge in Hinduya politics. He argued that all forms that become sources of inspiration for the opposition are systematically appropriated by the RSS. Appropriation is the only way that populist works.

Following the public lectures Prof Sabysachi summarized the two lectures. "The first speaker spoke on populist politics witnessed in Bangladesh, Pakistan and India. Stories were reflective of negative and positive sides of populism. Niravam's lectures—stories and anecdotes—indicate how the BNP RSS are able to appropriate culture, and why the other political parties are losing in the process." He pondered about the future of democracy in a populist world "while democracies are thought to due at coups, revolutions and guns; now democracies are strangled in the name of the people." He also urged researchers present in the audience to work on whether "financial crises create a notion that they are being governed by an ~~elite~~ ~~newspaper elite~~." Referring to an Italian experimental study that showed children who were subjected to social media and entertainment had "poorer cognitive skills" he commented that "every hour in front of TV or something else, reading, exploring or doing something else. Putting our attention to mindless pleasure and desire will be our doom."

Two public lectures on Populism and Popular Politics in India, organized by CRES was held on December 16, 2019. The programme was chaired by Sabreena Basu Ray Chaudhury. Rajai Roy gave an overview of the project Populism and Popular Politics in South Asia & India. He explained how the interest in populism had begun with many questions, towards an attempt to understand and conceptualise populism. He underlined the need to differentiate between the populist discourses in the west from the experiences of postcolonial countries.

Popular Beliefs and Folk Economics

Achin Chakraborty

Achin Chakraborty in his presentation attempted to understand the divergences that exist between economic analysis and people's beliefs. He argued that this divergence becomes more visible at present through it exists' earlier and the cross-country surveys done in recent times prove the same. There is a deeper disconnect between the expert knowledge of the economists and the untested popular beliefs of the people. For example, if we look at the issue of immigration, the scientific studies show that it does not affect the job prospects of the host country, but most of the people in those countries have a different belief. The policy of immigration receives greater visibility during elections in the west. Folk economics belief is a subject of study only now. Chakraborty says that it would be important to speculate upon the reasons that cause the divergences between folk economic belief and economic wisdom as it would be difficult to pin down the exact reasons.

Collectively held beliefs and opinions of people are formed not by evidence, to any empirical studies. But differently, Chakraborty argues that in the case of economic studies these beliefs and opinions have two types of consequences. People choose according to their beliefs and form their expectations in regard to this and secondly, they act according to these beliefs. This kind of unintended consequence may affect the dynamics of the economy itself. This could be considered as one kind of connection that had discussed before and another could be that had their people mostly in democracies vote according to these factual beliefs and then become their opinions.

Now the economists themselves understood the gap that exists between good economics and politics. Chakraborty raised the question that whether the economists are supposed to work until this gap converges. This has been the view expressed by Banerjee and Duflo in their recently published book "Good Economics for Hard Times". He suggested that probably these economists believe that their views are right and a beneficial outcome of scientific studies could be attained in the long run. This notion makes them more aware from the public realm that further extends the gap between both. People are mostly interested in immediate issues. He argues that economists expertise confines themselves into long term issues in contradiction to people's interests.

Chakraborty further discussed the development of the collective cognitive model. If we look at the tacit knowledge of Michael Polanyi, such a model entails knowledge that cannot be codified but has an epistemology. This kind of knowledge has a social aspect to it different from the explicit knowledge that is produced in an institution. Thus tacit knowledge has a much wider scope. Probably one could think about shifting between beliefs and tacit knowledge. Nevertheless, it would be difficult to demarcate the borderline between both. It is also significant that the institutional production of economic knowledge on the other hand has become more and more disconnected from people's interests and hopes.

In conclusion, he tried to bring in the psychological aspects like process of formation of the other and the aspects of the zero-sum game that becomes part of the collective cognitive model. It is difficult to explain popular politics in the realm of economic policies through a single approach. The beliefs of the people are dynamic and vary according to the context. An exploration of developmental economics is indeed important.

The Nature of Populism and the Opportunity of Political Parties

Anantan Chatterjee

The second feature of the evening was delivered by Anantan Chatterjee, editor of the vernacular newspaper, Amarikumar Patrika. The esteemed speaker as introduced by Subhasish Basu Ray Chaudhury, is an economist by training and has authored numerous articles and journals.

At the onset of the lecture, Chatterjee clarified that the lecture would be more of a discourse which would help raise some of the contours about the thematic premise of the lecture. His confusion, as he suggested stemmed from the inadequacy of literature on populism which he deems to be a muddled concept. The goal of the lecture was to try and understand whether the available literature on populism gives any useful insights into the current state of politics in India in the context of majoritarian aggression and to devise an effective counter strategy to deal with such divisive politics.

The speaker opined that from a perusal of populism literature, three fundamental elements of populism prevalent in the United States and the European Union could be traced, the "people", the "elite" and the "others". This kind of populism, describable as an ideology pits a "arrogant and homogeneous "people" against a set of "elites" and "dangerous others". The latter are depicted to be attempting to deprive the people of their sovereign rights, values, and voice. The lecturer presented a short summary of this: arrogant people bad elite and dangerous others.

The concept of the "state" versus the "people" is inherently an amalgamation of western philosophy with the concept of representative democracy. It is sometimes confused with fascist authoritarian rule. Chattopadhyay was of the opinion that the idea and working of populism are well subsumed in the structure of representative democracy, more realistically, it is off its permanent station and it also feeds on the broken promises of representative democracy. He went on to explain the mechanism of the same, the neoliberal takeover of global economy and politics in the last 25 years, perhaps that populist politics has largely increased inequalities and discrimination, it has wreaked havoc on social justice and social equality and undermined the actions of governments, since most governmental policies have come to be governed by capitalist interests. This has paved the way for broken promises by the governments of the world. These broken promises imply that the people are not ruling as it should be in democracies which creates a vacuum and facilitates the entry of populists. The populist motto is, "We are the people we represent them and we take over the tools of representative democracy to rule over them." In simple terms, populists function on the ideology of liberating the people from their democratic capture and then ruling over the people as their agents. The speaker feels that this situation is an example of homogeneous people versus the elite who had captured the instruments of representative democracy.

The knowledgeable lecture pointed out that in India, it is clear that there are huge dissonances with this structure as described above which may be attributed to rural-urban inequalities, a neoliberal religion and the agency of the people. Behind the facade of representative democracy, the actual ability of people to elect their rulers is getting less and by Jay Chattopadhyay was of the opinion that it is incorrect to say that representative democracy has failed completely and that the populists have taken over the dues. Instead, the reality of the situation is, that the people who have taken over the guns of the political elite, India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi tries to portray himself as the working commoner, sometimes in the attire of a cleanliness enthusiast, sometimes in the garb of a charwoman but this is not a political rhetoric, albeit a successful one in the enlightened news of the sneider the present BJP government looks at the opposition the dynastic Congress party as the corrupt elite, however it is actually they themselves are a part of the unscrupulous elite.

In the next segment of the discourse Chatterjee has shifted focus on the "others." He expressed that the people versus the others debate is important to understand more so because, it is crucial to find a counter-strategy against the discrimination in the context of India's current majoritarian rule: a rule where the rulers try to typify the "others" as vicious, dangerous and "anti-national" and try to prove that their actions are against the interest of the people. The speaker tried to shed light on who these "people" actually are: a concept which is beyond the narrow and homogenous definition given by the present rules. He suggested that this tendency of the ruler's stems from a typically populist idea of claiming moralistic monopoly over the "people." Chatterjee expressed his concern that a section of society that has been bearing the brunt of the tyranny of those rulers is the section that expresses dissent or does anything that is against their ideologies. A relevant example would be that of Non-Governmental Organizations or NGOs that oppose the government, whose problems and conflicts stem from the inability that they face because of their anti-government stance. The learned speaker believes that the rulers cannot tolerate NGOs since they question the morality of the government which is a bane to the government's attempts to maintain a moral monopoly over the people. The speaker directed the attention of the audience to events such as the ones in campuses like Jawaharlal Nehru University where the real issue was that the moral authority of the rulers has challenged what it valentines for them since the very foundation of the ruler's rule is based on their moralistic claim that they are naturally homogeneous rulers of the people. Chatterjee further gave the example of Donald Trump, who had in his electoral campaign, vowed the populist philosophy of giving primacy to the people and dismissing the rest as insignificant. The speaker stressed on the fact that the people versus the other construction is crucial to understand the nature of populism, society is faring at present.

Chatterjee then moved on to the final section of his address: A discussion on policies, strategies. According to him the first strategy is to deny that there is one homogeneous people. Left Liberalism has revolved around this idea since India is plural and diverse which is the economy's strength. He opined that Indians should convey how diverse they actually are, as an attempt to know what the rulers want to do with us. However, this strategy alone is not enough to counter the right populist onslaught, especially since the talk of diversity as promised in the last Lok Sabha elections is being used by the right populists as a tool of weakness. The speaker mentioned the works of several intellectuals such as Chandra Mouli

"Left Populism" and the Right: Benedito lectures given by Partha Chatterjee in Columbia University entitled "The people." Chatterjee's idea is to construct an alternative and radical definition of "people" contrasting a "people" out of the different kinds of social movements taking place and finding the chain of connections among these movements. From the commonalities amongst these movements, one can think of building a radical idea of "people" and radicalising democracy. The speaker apprised the audience that though Partha Chatterjee accepts the society with a popular movement, he questions the idea of radicalising democracy on the basis of social movements. The speaker concurred his view with that of Partha Chatterjee, which states that one has to transcend populism to fight populism. He explained the meaning of the same by explaining that one has to think of the radical political will to create a counter-strategy against rightist populism.

In a concluding note, the speaker shed some light on the recent events plaguing the country. He argued that one must think of alternative representations of the people, but of many types of "people" in the basis of different social movements around us. He felt that the multitude of struggles happening in a political context compels people to shut their eyes on many small struggles and focus on the bigger struggle of the lot. He elaborated that such struggles relate to livelihood, education, health, forest rights and many more issues which are invariably alien to the middle-class or the upper-middle-class of the lot. The speaker ended his lecture by impressing on the audience the need to reflect on and think about all the struggles that people are facing in the present socio-political landscape and examine their potential to challenge the oligarchy which is one way in which we as a whole may make it out safely from this onslaught.

Satyasadhu Basu Ray Chaudhury summed up the lectures delivered by the distinguished speakers. He pointed out that Achin Bisht's talk had highlighted the disconnect between popular beliefs and the expert knowledge of social scientists/economists in particular and explained how these beliefs lead to populism. He also opposed Amitabh Chatterjee's reference to the monopolisation of the moralistic state of the people by the government particularly in the Indian context. He posed a pertinent suggestion to the audience about the means of finding a counter-strategy by means of the construction of an alternative "people" drawing attention to the plural words and radical political subjects. He reflected that the issue that remains unanswered with scope of further study, is how contemporary trends of populism impact representative democracy. In the near future, are these homogenous trends include both electronic and print media; and more importantly social media – all of which spread rumors, make beliefs and perceptions and help the ascent of populism.

The next segment of the event was a question and answer session, where some analytical and lucid topical questions were taken by the audience. Kanalika Samanta quoted the Roman orator and philosopher Cicero and his view on the sharing of wealth. With this background, he asked Achin Chakraborty the extent to which experience factors into economics as a science. He clarified that economics is a science and not philosophy since experience is not considered to be an essential element of science. He also asked for the speaker's opinion on whether he considers economists to be pure scientists or a concern that he termed as "policy science." A member of the audience asked the pertinent question of whether the disconnect between popular belief and good economics actually exists. Moreover, another attendee suggested that the disconnect between these two concepts is embedded in the very language of economics. He stated that if the ~~event~~ of ~~concern~~ the presentation of the two speakers of the night how would economists come to themselves until radical democracy. Achin Chakraborty in his answer drew attention to the fact that at present, scientists are not happy since they are tormented by the constant question of whether their research is being utilised to help people. The speaker concluded that he feels that in order to validate their research and work accordingly and fit the social scientist's purpose, happen themselves to make their work socially relevant. As far as the significance of experience in economics – a science goes the speaker stated that on the basis of what needs in economics people discard the instrumental rationality of giving any importance to experience in economics. As a shift from how it was understood earlier, economics has now moved closer into a realm where research translates into policy suggestions.

Samit Kama Das posed the next set of questions for both the speakers. He stated that contrary to Achin Chakraborty's notion of "good economics versus bad politics," he would term it as "bad economics creates bad politics, since had the ~~theorist~~ in question been reasonably good, they would have taken into account felt economic beliefs, common beliefs, tacit knowledge and other issues. Instead he attracted the attention of the audience to a creature denoted as 'political economy' which takes into account many of these issues. Political economy registers the failure of economists to take these issues into account. He also spoke about the speaker's attempt to explain popular beliefs by way of switching off to cognitive science. Samit Kama Das also addressed Achin Chakraborty's speech and stated that one problem that makes us believe that there is no counter strategy to the picture painted by the speaker is that populism wages but the alternatives because it establishes monopoly over the moral world of people is a possible result of the post-modern intervention. Amritan Chatterjee answered the question by reminding the audience that the postmodern movement was extremely important in this context, since at that time, we lost a lot when the old world crumbled, but also gained a lot such as new ways of looking at justice. He said that while something more comes as a counter-strategy, we have to connect moral worlds. As an example he spoke about economic developments benefiting tribal people. The movements of such development belong to a ~~totally~~ different moral world than the tribes they seek no benefit. The way to connect these moral worlds is by creating a dialogue or connection between these two worlds and alternative moralities.

In another question a member of the audience asked whether between the two classes of economists, namely, the pro-capitalists and welfare economists, the latter group is trying to satisfy the needs of populists. To this Arjun Chakraborty suggested that economic policies of populist vary from country to country. So an economic policy such as a poverty alleviation programme would be considered a populist strategy in India, but not so in Europe where poverty is measured in relative and not absolute terms. The answer remains variable and contextual. Another member of the audience asked Amritan Chatterjee if the alternative politics he advised the audience to create could be done without usurping power. To this Amritan Chatterjee pointed out that the goal of politics that is seen in the practical world; any political struggle may be based on the idea of capturing power. He said that it was important to note that though the recent past has been full of radical political movements in India, there have been important local or regional movements which have had an impact on state and central elections, a manifestation of which is power politics. He ended the session by safely stressing on the fact that there is a huge possibility that movements such as these may have the impact of capturing power.

Report: In a large number of countries from global north to global south including South Asia, populist politics is fast gaining ground. South Asia and India are used as the example of several types of populism over time. In the context Professor Kamalir Samadani's lecture included a review of Chantal Mouffe's book For a Left Populism as well as his observations ranging from Achintha's The Prime to more contemporary thinkers regarding the future of populism. Different possibilities of populist politics in South Asia and India were discussed in the lecture and their potential to pose a challenge to neo-liberalism. The lecture is part of CRG's ongoing research project on Populism and Populist Politics in South Asia.

Report: To take the example of D.N. Dhanagare's study of the farmers' movement in western India, especially Maharashtra, from the 1930s to 2011 (Populism and Power: Farmers' Movement in Western India, 1930-2011) we find ourselves on the trail of rich archival sources and numerous well-studies where the umbrella category of "agrarian populism" is woven far and wide into the fabric of political populism. Summarizing his study in the aporia between populism as an ideology on the one hand, and the political parties within the semi-colonial state structure, on the other, Dhanagare in fact explores the complex crosslinking between populist ideology and mass participation. How well did it fare at the hustings? Sometimes it fared well, sometimes not. Against this backdrop of mixed electoral fortunes the popular emerges as the dominant idiom that undergirds the book's chief populistic ethos, in my reading then, tries to legitimate the popular interface between Dhanagare's meta-historical ideology and political power.

The Emergence of Pakistan from The Dawn, New Delhi, 1947

Gopal Saldanha

Drawing on a larger co-authored interdisciplinary project examining six English-language newspapers from the Indian Subcontinent in the year 1947, Saldanha's paper outlined its analysis of the Dawn, New Delhi, and its role in representing the case for the creation of Pakistan and itself as the official and only authentic voice of the Muslims in India. The Dawn, founded by Mohammed Ali Jinnah, published from New Delhi was an important feature of the League campaign for Pakistan. The successful campaign used many techniques to get across its message of rejecting any idea of India being a composite whole. It vilified everything and everyone from Nehru and his interim Government to Gandhi, the Congress and all leading nationalist Muslims carried its message with clarity and purpose never losing sight of its purpose. All of its space including advertisements where possible and even columns like the letters to the editor and the Children's section were harnessed to the task. Her presentation set out the composite instance of the task for Pakistan in the Dawn – achievement and finally the newspaper's shift to publication from Karachi in September 1947. It thus cut across many of the themes of the conference.

Popular Politics, Visual Spectacles and the Role of the Popular in Contemporary Kolkata

Saturni Mukherjee

The paper focused on the contemporary interface of populist politics and visual spectacles as witnessed in the context of Kolkata under the regime of Trinamool Congress (TMC) headed by Mamata Banerjee. It attempted to make an intervention in the analysis of the contemporary modes of populist politics in Kolkata by foregrounding the importance of the field of the visual in the performance of the political. The paper explored how recent modes of governance and populist mobilization techniques in the city under TMC are keenly focused on controlling perception and affective management of the masses, with systematic programs of aesthetic renovation of the city spaces. One of the central arguments of the paper was to use the thematic of the new visual fields of populism to wage the main line, if break from the past forms of populist politics in the city along three mainlines firstly through spreading government via several urban beautification schemes. Secondly, through organization of year-round cycle of festivals and thirdly the unprecedented investment in building a personality cult around a single leader by enlivening the city spaces with the omnipresent monographs of the Chief Minister's face in every government sponsored event and programmes. These are pursued on the basis of appealing to popular taste and capturing the imagination of the people. Drawing on ethnographic research, this paper attempted to analyze how popular urban cultures of leisure, consumption and spectatorship that the current ruling party in Bengal has been offering to the people by just trying to create a space for new urban public culture one that is markedly distinct from the earlier (left) mode of mass-politics in Kolkata. What is the imagination of the public and what are the forms of public good and popular taste that is driving the present investment in the politics of festivity and beautification? The first part of the paper offered a detailed historical based case study of the Lakshmi and Sreebhumi that has transformed from a postcolonial refugee sentences in an increasingly upmarket locution along the lines of gradual political shifts over the years wrought by local clubs and marked by the patronage and image of local party leaders in recent years. From this microcosm of a locality the narrative moves to a larger space—the E M bazaar where it is more directly about the state and the ruling party’s capture of public spaces through their Governmental or economic or communal political strategies. It provided a critical intersection of the governmental strategy of populism on the one hand and what can be fundamentalist seen by those politics on the other hand, where the visual constantly becomes the performative ground for the political.

From Mitra, the chair of the session, there is a connection between the two papers, and posed a few pertinent questions to the presenters. Firstly, what is public and what is popular? How does one differentiate between the public and the popular? When exactly does the popular begin? With regard to the first paper on The Newspaper as Political Actor—The Dawn-View Dham, what Dr Gopu Saha would be interested in the ambiguity regarding who exactly were reading the newspaper makes one wonder how the political pronouncements initiated by The Dawn resonated with the public on the ground and to what extent and how the cult of Anna was actually nourished. He also pointed out that the anonymity of the letters to the editor is another intriguing aspect and the identity of the authors of such letters would have facilitated our understanding about which sections of people were shaping and expressing their opinions to the newspaper. With regard to the second paper on Festivals, Politics, New Media, Gender and the Art of the Popular: A Comparative Lecture by Soumitra Mukherjee, he observed that while the festivities like book fair and film festival in Kolkata mark a continuity between the established and the present ruling dispensation in West Bengal such events are in more just purely intellectual exercises. Festivals like tree fair are perceptible attempts to popularize such events. He was rather of the opinion that shift from local communities to local clubs in the organizational hotspots of the current ruling party in the State does have a resonance with the past in the sense that most of the organizational activities of the left parties during their regime also took place in the club buildings. Thus, it is difficult to conceptually segregate the imagines that marks the organizational patterns of mobilization of the erstwhile left wing and the incumbent TMC rule in the state. With regard to the religious festivities as tools of mobilization he wondered if the community of time and space is as all possible. Mitra also pointed out that the festivities in India in galvanise popular imagination is indeed a matter of scale due to political economy related to inheritance as it is manifested in the various poles of residential complexes in the area.

known for spectacular and extravagant manifestations of festivities especially Durga puja in the city. V. Ramaswamy asked Sabharwal if it was possible to fathom how the political propaganda instigated by The Dawn with its communal discourse influenced the agenda of partition. He drew a parallel of such propaganda tactics with contemporary developments. For instance the congratulatory letter of Prime Minister from the children of Kashmir to express legitimacy for the government's recent move in Kashmir. Mr. Ramaswamy also pointed out to Mukherjee that the political appropriation of elite is not new in Bengal and how RSS eventually initiated the process of consolidating their control in the state by similar organizational tactics. Sudipto Basu pointed out that as Mukherjee's Urussojan creates a) the commodification of the social it would be interesting to see how the spectator would look in the spectacle and b) the effect of such representation on the family and neighbourhood. He also differentiated the two different periods of 1947 and the present that the two papers dealt with and observed that the commodification of the social happened differently in two different times. Xanana Barbara turned to understand from Sabharwal whether an equivalent of the modern day twitting all social media also took place. The letters to the editor in the newspaper very well in 1947. Sumati Dasgupta asked the panel how they would want to define populism? Since there is no consensus regarding the definition is the discursive style? If the populism is always defined in opposition to the dispossessed elite? How do we analyse it? Anup Shekhar Chakraborty wondered how does the political project of Chief Minister Mamata Banerjee will be reflected in the historical illuminations of the same? How do people resonate with the masses especially in the slum areas? He also asked Sabharwal whether the present prime minister's policies, speaking through the newspaper in 1947 in his research. Gopal Sabharwal in response to the question asserted that populism indeed needed to be defined against something. For instance, the political propaganda of The Dawn had a strong communal character as it placed itself against the 'small-dominated' Congress party in 1947. However it is interesting to note that it was not communal. Seema Mukherjee in her response said that she is attempting to comprehend the connect the people through her research and also exploring the connect between the popular and the spectacle. She mentioned that the political economy of fest is also taking place due to urbanisation and how the idea of glamour is juxtaposed with the idea of development. Lastly, she drew the attention of the house to how the transition of regime is marked by the change in the nomenclature of identifying the festivities. For instance the usages of phrases like Durga Puja and Navratri etc., are cases in point. She concluded with the observation that the occasions are increasingly getting commercialised.

Mohammed Puthussery

Looking at the re-emergence of what may be called red film—films that idealize and celebrate the spirit of communism—and the visible presence of Left-leaning film makers in the Malayalam film industry, this paper argued how popular cinema has emerged as a key site in the reconstruction of a Malayali national popular. Despite the apparent dismissive the Left in Kerala shows towards popular cinema, the element of the popular has played a significant role in the construction of a national popular centred on the linguistic identity in Kerala. While Malayali shares a historical affinity with popular items such as commerce, opera, melodrama, etc., the Left in Kerala shows a more scepticism in the field of culture as a result of the rise of Hindu nationalism in the country which conflates culture and religion. Apart from the “cultural interventions” of the right-wing the Left also faces serious challenges from the part of various social movements centred on the question of caste, gender and religious identities. The rise of social movements in the 1990s brought to the fore the questions of caste and gender that were submerged under the earlier socio-cultural consensus generated by the hegemonic Malayali national popular shaped by the community. In such a context, Puthussery argued that the domain of popular registers questions related to gender, caste, etc. which the political Left has often failed to explore. Hence, he further argued that the red films and the left-leaning filmmakers undertake the construction of a new “Left popular” in the state which contributes to the emergence of a new people. Given the distinct nature of the relationship between cinema and Left politics in the state this paper explored the transactions between the popular domain and popular politics in the state in the contemporary times.

Mohsin KK

Discourse on Capital: Miliband argued that reinforcing the idea of "people" and presenting it as a morally good force against "the elite" population, is a set of political processes that primarily dwell on the opposition between the elites and the common people. Populism thus puts into question the institutional order by constituting it as a historical agent as an emancipatory social force through which marginalised groups challenge dominant power structures. There has been a steady rise in populism across the world in the recent past and it has become detrimental to liberal democracies more than ever. The right-wing populism that has become a prominent model in the recent past is largely based upon the claim of ownership of the Hindu majority over the nation and the substantial existence of Muslims and other minorities. This apparent right-wing populism which has achieved momentum in India is arguably quite different from the left-wing populism, which claims to be more democratic in nature and the rhetoric of peasant populist sentiments. His study tried to critically engage with contemporary populist movements in Kerala namely 'The Kiss of Love protest' (2014), Ammanava Sangamam (2015) and 'People's Hirala' (2018) which are quite different from the cultural experience. Utilizing the classical Marxist conceptualisation of populism as a movement driven by raise consciousness, the driving force behind many populist movements took place in the Southern Indian state of Kerala in the recent past over certain events. These movements were neither held within the ambit of any political parties nor motivated by any ideological impurities. While Kiss of Love was a trans-gender protest against moral policing following the calls in a Facebook page, Ammanava Sangamam was a counter response to the alleged exclusion of Muslim organizations at Mamishva Sangamam (Human Meet), a left collective of People Against Racism. On the other hand no organization claimed responsibility in People's Hirala, a mass strike which was called through certain WhatsApp groups to protest and seek justice for a minor girl who was brutally raped and murdered in Kathua region of the Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir. The paper further discussed the dynamics in the realm of popular political movements and the Kerala social fabric quite different from the Marxist narratives of class struggle and mobility. Engaging with the Human Meet that populist movements limit democratic possibilities, the paper studied the complexity in the relationship between peasant movements and popular culture. The paper further studies how communitarian spaces configure within the ambit of populist particularistic thinking at the absence presence of Islam in the movements above mentioned. As populist movements denote a particular mode of articulation it is important to look at the social logics of these articulations. The paper focused on the conception of the idea of general will to identify politics has become highly crucial in Indian context and how does general will manifest in these movements unlike the conception of general will by the social contract theorists as the condition of democracy?

Following the panel discussion Rajesh Khanal argued that it is important to not get caught in monikers such as 'left populist' when we are thinking about populism as it prevents us from seeing certain realities. For instance in Nepal, the left has mobilised not only leftist ideas and symbols as part of their movement in the popular culture but in recent times has also been using figures like Netralekha. This raises the question of the current and then interventions in the culture and the feasibility of the idea of a leftist popular culture. Sabita Biswas posed the following question to both panellists: are these populist moments and movements in question becoming possible as a result of popular measures enacted by the central government as well as the majoritarian policies of the ruling dispensation? She also raised whether some of the specific examples Molima raise in her paper can be truly classified as 'populist'. Further, what are the cultural forms integral to the populist movements? How does populism like Oromo like armed Hindu settlers in Nepal for instance, get caught up in the debate around culture and populism? Biswas also brought to bear on the project a comparative dimension – the Mamata brand of Bengal politics has largely depended on religion to facilitate its populist mobilisation that has ultimately been seen as unsuccessful. Ranabir Samaddar's intervention in the panel brought attention to the issue of colonial history. Before venturing into describing and analysing empirical phenomenon in terms of populism he argued it is important that we engage with the concept with enough seriousness so that there can be consistency and clarity in its deployment. This will require paying attention to the theoretical contours of the term populism and the various analytical possibilities challenged as well as shortcomings that the framework brings into play. Empirical work thus necessarily departs the framework of populism will tend to remain superficial and largely unproductive. Rather than taking the term national populism for granted, he urged the panellists to look into the specific meanings of the term in Gramsci. Further, Samaddar invited the panellists to consider the following question. Has there ever been a national without also simultaneously being popular? With

Ram brought up the following question: what might be a left intervention in culture conceived broadly – as the lived experience of people in the everyday. Is, within family, workplaces and so on, other than that which takes place in cinema and theater – look like? He also pressed Pathissery on the term communist desire – a term Pathissery borrows from Jack Dean – and argued for a closer attention to the term in terms of the ‘context’ of this desire: i.e. whether it needed to be non-capitalist “anti-capitalist” or at the least an hegemonic desire. Do we need to look at the kind of political, if you can say, claims that are often attributed as instances of a ‘communist’ desire more critically he wondered. Md Ali Islam’s comment, directed at Pathissery’s paper, helped to flesh out the fact that Dalit is not an identity that exists with any kind of self-sufficiency. Rather, it comprises of a group of subaltern caste identities that usually come to assume the subject position of Dalit through collective politics and mobilisation.

Populism as Political Practice: The “Missing Link” in Social Justice in India

Minali S. Jha

In his presentation, Jha examined populism as political practice – the practice that invokes the idea of social justice through asymmetries of caste. The idea of the Indian constitution and demands of liberal democracy that shaped post-colonial Indian politics witnessed the evolution of populism in dynamic yet diverse forms. The dynamics could be observed, ascertained and assessed in different federal units in very many ways. The ideological underpinnings of populism engage with its idiom and plausis, discursive, institutional formations, mobilizing techniques, impacts etc. He however looked at populism at play in the Hindu Nationalist (in general) and in the state of Bihar in particular. Apart from what do we mean by populism and how do we assume the practice of politics in the realm of populism, the paper primarily engaged with the idea of “various kinds” (social Justice) that dominated the impetus of populism in the states under discussion. What has been the articulation and manifestation of social Justice and where does caste enter in this practice of “populism”? Conceptually and strategically, is caste and attempt to use better model, is it the in the process of caste arithmetic, the practice of inclusion and exclusion complicates the process." If one takes the Anthropologists' idea of dealing with the caste question and therefore responding to practice in classical terms it would have meant amelioration of caste. But did the social Justice articulation in the Jharkhand at one point not have attempted that? The answer is emphatic 'no'. Instead, it reconfigured the caste grouping for mobilisation and electoral assertion and thereby turning caste social into caste political. Has this been a careful and conscious decision and informed by the pragmatism the populists seem to value. The language from senior ideologues and slogans used since the time of articulation for social justice in general and caste politics in particular by leading socialist leaders in late 1970s; the more that practice of populism took in the Jharkhand navigated through tumultuous phases. How are we to appraise this practice of politics through the management of caste? How are we to comprehend the ideas, strategies and outcome of such populism? To grasp the import and trajectory of the contours of populism in Jharkhand, it is prudent to reconstruct its engagement within a specific timeframe. This paper makes an attempt to traverse from the past to the contemporary as also to understand the political shifts in situated manner.

Populist Land Policies and Disclosing Marginalisation: Study of Land Rights Movement of Bauli in Purnia District in Jharkhand and Beyond

Harendra Singh

Harendra began his presentation by stating that since the question of amelioration of caste remained unsolved, identity politics of Dalits emerged as a key factor in the reason so this. It was very clear among the leaders who raised the voice in Dalits as these are socially, economically and politically backward groups. Even in Dalit political groups we can see the dominance of particular sub castes. The backwardness of Dalit led the government to make so called 'permissive policies' where Dalits were denied agricultural land right and therefore they remained landless labourers. Punjab is a state where more than 11% of its population is Dalit and the data on land ownership says that they own less than 1% and Despite the large numbers of Dalits, Dalit policies is not emerging in the state as expected. The recent agitation of rights over Panchayat Zamindari (considered landowner) in this study Dalit sub caste and genders coming forward to claim their constitutional rights. It has been mentioned in the Panchayat Village Committee Land Act, 1981 of the state that all kind of the Panchayati land would be transferred to the Scheduled Caste population of the village through anchoring. This process never materialised into reality till as late as 2006. A massive peasant movement like outcome of small agitations of Dalits demanding ownership of land started in the Malwa region from 2002 to 2016. transparent and fair distribution of land was observed in more than 60 villages with a parallel series of violence arrests of Dalits and electoral changes. Dalit farmers have started working in their own p. landowners. The hierarchy and division of labour and labourers has been broken to a certain extent by the movement. Above all, Dalits have been using collective farming and hence the actual sharing the produce within the community. There has been tremendous change in the social economic and political life of Dalits of rural Punjab. The agricultural land heretofore Haenlein's study focused on the qualitative and quantitative analysis of changes in the political life of Dalits of Balal Kalan village of Sangrur district in Punjab. His paper raised questions about how the representation of Dalits emerged in the Gram Sabha, Panchayat Raj Institutions, Local Committee elections and other organisations of Punjab's population [a Dalit have less state politics affect this movement]. It also explored the role of various institutions of families, gurukul, PRIs, police, administration, state and other stakeholders in making the popular policies where Dalits are denied their rights and common caste groups are acquiring the rights of other villagers. Another aspect of his study was to come up with the demands and suggestions of these Dalits which could help agricultural policy frameworks with regard to social justice.

Prof Chowdhury commented on the "overdue work in progress" that Manish Bhattacharya did. She pointed out that it is interesting that the wishes of the people and what the author sees ought to do is broader the lens of several years (Manish) more. But "there is populism". She argued that she was not talking about caste or castic identity and how successful the movement has been in realising the class dimension. Can social Justice movements in the territory of Bihar be invoked in UP if one is going on to class frameworks and not using other dimensions? In mobilisation of electoral alliances, populism provides dividends electorally. She points out that the question for Bengal is crucial, caste is an economic resource, which is not only about identity but materiality. Chowdhury asks, "How do you bring about the lens in the case of Karpoori Thakur and Modiji now? Are we to see Modiji's achievements and shifts from the same lens? Are we to undermine the engagement and claim something else than English? For instance, in Tamil Nadu where English becomes a living form, albeit which is different in comparison to Bihar. One time will tell if the Karpoori Thakur regime will fit into the lens." She pointed to a methodological issue that mechanics problem - (Bihar and UP are brought together. Razzasivam pointed out that de-elitization is an impactful term to refer to when and in what form things happened in India. In Calcutta, there are large numbers of Bihari migrants and in the last election, Bihar migrants played an important role and they supported the BJP. He asked Hazenika about the role of Khalistanis in the caste politics of Punjab. Ramkrishna Samaddar asked Manohar whether there are parallels between Traditionalist popular politics and new BJP politics. He further asked when exactly does socialist politics become the foil for right politics. The particular social justice is performed in order to make it a mainstay in the new right politics. "What is it that enables the new right to create support among dalits and say that they are in their politics? Where is the place of the dalit in the story? Is there an all India motion in this theory?" Samaddar's second point was about the large scale migration of Dalits from Bihar to India with legal status. Bharat Bhushan asked, "What happens to the larger category in the BJP elections? Does the BJP election fit in to demagogery?" He also asked about the Dalit movements where large sections of Dalit community were present, where do these movements in larger categories go? Are we talking about secularism or the possibility of right-wing politics? Anil Choudhury asked Manohar, "If we consider populism to be an anti-theory, how do you bring in populism in this social engineering?" Iman Mirra went on to refer to the phenomenon of power cuts. There was no power cut in the Yogi regime and the people were happy about this. He asked him, "What then is the connection between political infrastructure and physical infrastructure?" Arun Prakash had questions for both Manohar, Ila and Hazenika. To Manohar, he asked, "When you talk of social justice and the unhappiness with the conclusion, how is that different in social engineering? Are there no parameters left in the populist alliance of the left? With the same frame of the meaning there also has to be a common understanding. He wondered about the need to talk about de-elitization." To Hazenika, he asked, "why his work was drying away from real politics?" It emerges in Punjab and promise further meaning. Hazenika responded that the Khalistan movement was being instrumentalised by the右派 (right wing). He responded that his work takes into consideration the large corpus of nationalistic agitation and it will have one of its links about BJP's nationalism and socialist nationalism together. One would have to go through Lala Narayan Das and others. In his response to Narendra Chaudhary, he said, "through English we have to understand others who have never complained about English. With OBC reservation, these OBCs have trouble with English. Our Dalits have had problems with English which OBCs have?" He then went on to talk about social engineering with Kartikeya Tewari and the socialist and the Hindu rightism, Hindutva Congress and that brought RSS here when it did after Gandhi killing RSS was sufficient. It was at this time that socialists provided the opportunity to make them come back. He added: "And we say a capitalist now do we marginalise people, either they are minorities or making them a monolith. This only hope I have will give us courage. To me, gopnikism will not stand the test of time and it should not stand the test of time."

Panel Discussion IV: Land, Caste & Identities (B)

Chair: Kajalna Kamathian (Council for Social Development & CR+

In the name of the People: Citizenship Norms and the Peasant Movement

Indranil Deka

Indranil began her presentation by arguing that historically, the processes of uneven development, internal colonialism, neo-colonialism as well as the centre-periphery debate have occupied the central stage in the discourse on ethnic-based nationalism in the Northeast India in the understandings of these mobilisations: she asks what role do cultural factors play? The paper identified this question with the role played by Kashish, Maitri Sangram Saman Revolutionary Forum for Peasant Liberation, a leading and prominent peasant organisation in Assam, a group that also identified itself with the ethnic-nationalist question in Assam, India. It is primarily a peasant organisation which has mobilised landless peasants for land rights in forest villages, thus leading to voluntary links between the marginalised peasants and the colonised state and its institutions. By faring in general from its inception during the post-independence period, the paper highlighted how through the politicisation of ethnic identities based on the control of resources, a horizontal mobilisation is formed across caste and religious lines by leaders to maintain the legitimacy of the "culture". In popular politics while the question of identity questions is largely discussed in identity politics, what must be noted is how politics based on the identity shapes itself especially in the debate around populism. The pilot study conducted for the paper suggested that it is not merely peasant populism nor general populism. It argued that asymmetrical power structures and their institutions impact the course of mobilisation and negotiations at various levels in the form of colonial representations or native and strangers. A peasant-based movement lends its voice to the national front by actively participating for the National Register of Citizens (NRC) and against the Citizenship Amendment Bill 2018 in Assam. The paper found that over the period the issue of land and natural resources (economic struggle) and the advancement of development through legal and democratic means (rule of governance) have been consolidated by the process of graft standardisation. The paper thus questioned whether Dalit is a strategic resource in the populist movement or is it an adaptable apparatus to protect from the neo-liberal onslaught.

Right-wing intervention in Gondwana Politics

Kapil Tamang

Tamang argued that nationality identity politics has the potential to move towards right-wing politics as the question of hillside colonisation is that of The oppression of the minority by majoritarian dominance and the process of othering makes a good field for right-wing politics to use. The politics of Gondwana identity has always been the question of Nelongingness and a dream of a utopian solution; from the long oppression and discrimination. The movement started a banner under which went through many ups and downs but post 1990's paradigm shift came within the politics of Gondwana identity which brought in the traits of ethnocentrism and right-wing inclination. A recent change in central policies towards the rise of right-wing politics has affected the Gondwana identity politics to a large extent. The paper tried to explore the historical changes that happened to the movement and how the intervention of Right-wing politics in the identity politics of Gondwana took place. It, causes and effects also the process with which the intervention happened.

Slipping Space: Impact of Hindutva Politics on the Public Sphere

Rashadullah Khan

Rashadullah argued that the resurgence of the NDA in the 2019 Lok Sabha elections underlines the evolving political mindset of the majority in India. The Hindutva ideology that the BJP espouses has been cultivated for a part of the retrod state. The practice of this ideology on the public sphere – especially between 2014-19 has been pronounced with persecution of sometimes rural/tribal caste-based structures and those who oppose the ruling alliance. It further analysed, among, in the reframing of the existing policies with a specific agenda to cater to populist demands. These significant problems will in all probability now intensify with the re-election of a populist religious conservative agenda. The aim of his paper was to evaluate the effect of this agenda on the everyday public sphere of India, quantify the use of religious populism and its spatial distribution. The paper attempted to understand the mobilisation of electoral support by a populist regime and specifically the impact this has on minority and tribal populations of India.

Sudeep Basu had three primary questions. How do we make sense of the reversal of affective and material definitions? What conditions allow for the rise of right wing movements? What optics can be devised to deal with right wing parties arising from real or perceived separation? He cited Kapil on the turn of majoritarianism, its influence to the Gorkhaland movement; to the class attachments of Gorkhas? Rashed in Sudeep's opinion tried to trace the ways in which public spaces were shrinking and the fluctuating RSS in this space. Sudeep pointed to a common thread in the two papers that of the unfixing of capitalism and the role of mobilities and aspirations across transnational boundaries. He then commented on the uneven geographies of capital in India's case, and how different trajectories have these impacts. He then spoke about culture as a strategic resource in this context, the employing of an ethnic card to dilute the peasant question and delineating a 'decolonising movements' based on ethnic demands. KMSS cultivated ethnic identity over state identity and there emerged an emphasis on the ethnic-national-political over class issues. The politics of populism in Davang brought ethnic support to the neo-liberal state, it brought the migrant close to the state and related it to threats from migrant others. He spoke of how the papers attended to fractures in peasant identity as well as ethnic layers on peasants. Manju agreed with Rashed's overall argument, but had a problem with him engaging both Lacau and Habermas since they represent divergent arguments. Manju was also dissatisfied with Rashed's description of the tensions between an urban élite and the middle classes. Kalpana pointed out that all the papers needed to dive deeper into details. She asked how do we calibrate the detail though so the big picture can emerge through that.

Panel Discussion VII Parties, Leaders & the Democratic Question (A)

Chair: Bharat Bhushan, Independent Journalist & CKG

Political Parties and Populist Policies in Contemporary India: Some Reflections on the AAP

Amitava Datta

Shonoma DasGupta

In his presentation, Shonoma argued that appears to be little definitional clarity around the term populism. Though the use of this term has proliferated in the last decade, its common parlance here appears to be a pejorative construct associated with it and mixed views about how populism is connected with democracy and democratic institutions. In her paper she suggested deriving clarity from a value-laden understanding of populism as an ideology and staying true to an understanding that associates the right basis with an Indian contextualized new policy that is decentralitative in nature and as such favours the common person particularly those in subordinate positions over the elite typically represented by large business and financial interests. The connect between the people and elite in terms of strategies, movements, policies, organisations is perhaps the only way the non-populists can retain its analytical usefulness without getting bogged down in political discussions as to whether populist movements represent the ideological right or the left, whether it is authoritarian or democratic in its origin, whether it represents a movement or simply a discursive style. The presentation examined selected populist policies launched in contemporary India by a party that grew out of a popular movement against corruption namely the Aam Aadmi Party (AAP) which in its very name creates a implicit contrast between "the people" and the elite. By focusing on some of its key populist policies the paper tried to gain a deeper understanding of how a movement "for the people" transitioned into a political party which then had to make policies that were seen to be pro "Aam Aadmi" and what the populism implies in terms of democratic decision-making and longer term impacts on the economic and political front.

Sherif Ila

This paper looks Muslim political representation in the post-1947 Deccan as a site for exploring the dialectical relationship between institutional politics and popular mobilization. Among the foremost charges against populist politics is the representation of vulnerable groups as the other and therefore the enemy of The People that is the subject of popular discourse. If populism names a fantasy of political community, unmediated by institutional representation and based instead on a logic of embodied and therein direct representation by a charismatic leader or party, it is worth noting that precisely these characteristics are usually attached to the political practices of minority groups and marginalized. Moreover, it is when one looks at the dynamics of minority political representation that the inevitable entanglement of populism with institutional representative politics becomes visible. These are the connections that are explored in considering the career of the All India Muls-e-Inbaudh ul Muslimin (AIMIM) of Hyderabad, which now represents the city of Hyderabad as well as Aurangabad (Maharashtra) in Parliament in the post-Poole Action (1948) period.

Democracy, Representation and The Participatory Tradition: A Study of the Communist decades

Tripur Ram

I have argued that nothing in the constellation of notions subsumed under the term populism precludes divergence of thought, perhaps, in informed participation. It is the source of much hope and much fear both in theory and practice. While the fear comes from sources as diverse as the anxiety about the battle cry to the voice of majoritarian subversion of constitutionalism, the hope usually comes from this question could revolution be the modernity that finally fulfills the emancipatory promise of democracy.<sup>1</sup> The contentious debates concerning revolution has a lot to do with the tension between fear and hope about the notion of participation. For other popular movements mobilize dissatisfaction against elites while it is perceived, however, by keeping the people 'on'. This paper was based on ethnographic and historical research on the participatory initiatives of the Communist Party in Kerala. It attempted to show how the idea of 'emancipated' while carrying the emancipative promise of democracy, retains the potential to be incorporated into various discursive practices within a given political landscape often resulting in fissiparous repetition, parody and banality surviving the participatory tradition within Kerala commentary in three phases. It demonstrated how the modalities of participation can bring about forms of political engagement that range from the truly transformative to the merely banal. Rather than treat them as 'ideal' or 'contingent', the paper showed them as possibilities ingrained within democratic politics, their final expression subject to the contingencies of history and politics.

The Chair asked the panellists whether populism can only be seen as a redistributive strategy. How does it negatively affect the people? Does the construct of populism emanate from the people or from the leader? How is populism linked to dominant leaders? He observed that the Alami-Harris movement which was an expression of popular upsurge against the ruling establishment gave rise to two significant bourgeois leaders in India, Arvind Kejriwal and Narendra Modi. He also gave an example of the populist measures adopted by a minister in Kerala by distributing jackfruit plants. Iman Nitin asked the presenters if we can trace the origin of AAP style politics in the post 1991 era; this is the post liberalisation period which ushered in an age of consumerism and raised the political slogan of 'Jai Shakti Jai Lok'. He wondered whether the recipient of AAP's politics is the consumer/political subjects. And he further went ahead to ask whether such an explanation is extended to NIM in Hyderabad is it that the politics of circulation and access to working time? He further asked, whether in the 2019 national elections, one form of populism triumphed over another? With regard to the second paper, he asked whether does majority-minority mechanism become communal in the context of the third presentation. He asked whether populist parties exert centralization of power? He further mentioned that green technology and related governance practices are ideas of consumerism. Abhishek Bhattacharya asked in the context of the third presentation how can Maoist mobilization be viewed and what would be the combination of people and participation? Can there be a non-populist trajectory of mass mobilization? Sudheep Basu raised questions about the participatory potential of populism in the context of the third presentation. What is the use of language of the participants in the research on populism? Arun Prakash asked the first presenter whether the successful experiments of transforming schools and health clinics can be called populist? He also commented that the third presentation on populist styles in Kerala from time immemorial. Lopamudra Ray observed that the Communist party in Kerala remains nominally democratic but actually indifferent. He asserted that popular participation calls Statists tendencies. With regard to the use of language, he responded that a leader is identified both as a father as well as brother.

However, the language on the ground proves to a tragic farce which needs to be historically constituted. He further pointed out that in reality there are not only examples of ethnic-patriotism but also of ensuing violence. Lastly, he has cited the example of new social movements which point to the fissures and challenges in the existing narrative. She felt that people's voices force will be coupled with governmental authority. She further responded that the problem with majority and minority populism is not the same. The political success of AIMIM in Hyderabad has caused hope of empowerment among the minority and they aspire to have some claim that is commensurate to the majority. Lastly, she observed that it is not possible to either, the majority. Sunaina DasGupta highlighted the contradiction that marks the politics of AAP. On the one hand, it has carved a distinct political narrative in the realm of its regional politics. On the other hand, it also aspire to erase the narrative of the national political discourse which is often marked by tremendous authoritarian overtones that bears resemblance with the discourse of RSS and BJP. She pointed AAP's clear nationalistic stand on Kashmir, which is incongruous to its political predilection at the local level. Lastly, she defined populism as an immediate relationship between the leader and the people which gives considerable flexibility to the term, and she concluded that populism can coexist with authoritarianism.

Panel Discussion VI: Parties, Leaders, & the Democratic Question (B)

Modi, Banerjee, Patnaik: Politics of Democracy?

Speakers: Pratim Basu

The present article highlights the forces of central intelligence, the CBI and the State Police of West Bengal over the investigation, arrest of Mr. Kolkata CP and the subsequent Parambari Sava Comoronan at Metro Channel Esplanade – the head of Kolkata by the Chief Minister Mamata Banerjee and their holding of tabors meetings in Amaksharini office room beside the platform of other two parties, that shocked a large number of people throughout the country. Mamata's style of politics and administration was again consumed the prime times of national regional news channels, hit the headlines of all the dailies and was in most circulation in all forms of social media – Facebook, WhatsApp and Twitter. In this nationwide discourse – apart from allegations and counter-allegations over the hypothetical CBI and the ‘realtime’ WB Police which detained the CBI officers and even temporarily besieged the latter's office buildings) – a deep concern for the crisis of democratic institutions was also expressed. The former deplored the holding of cabinet meetings and official programmes on streets as the instances of supreme disrespect to the long cherished democratic norms and practices. In a recent editorial Swatantra Bengal Patrika, while giving a laudable compliment to Mamata's tilt-left politics over Modicloudiness has also treated it as defeat of democracy. Basu pointed out that in recent history, we find a parallel of Mamata's move in the stalinisation of Raj Niwas, Delhi, the Governor's residence by the against-the Aravind Kejriwal in June 2018 along with some of his colleagues of the AAP government. One can also find somewhat similarity between the Janata Bharat of Kejriwal since 2014 and Mamata's holding of public Secretarial meetings in districts of the state that were coming to office in 2011. But the latter has now become a regular affair which has generated tremendous enthusiasm and expectation in common masses (especially in Jharkhand, Bihar and Kolkatta) but at the same time which has disturbed the formalistic mind-set of my bureaucrat who generally fits in like Bengal from Kolkatta. Many critics even saw a drama for cheap popularity at the cost of assessment of bureaucracy and thereby lowering down the value of an essential institution of the modern state: the bureaucracy. Basu argued that most the populist policies in South Asia in general and the last 3 years' rule of Mamata in West Bengal with populist programmes like 'Kanyashree' for girl students, Sabadsabha – cycles for students of backward classes rice in Rs 2/kg through PDS schemes for peasants, full artists, artisans, folk, folk, Jamaijaijai to youth clubs etc has pushed further the sacred boundaries of conventional liberal democracy in such a way that it demands the might and labour of social scientists to grasp adequately the meanings and implications of such policies which cannot be even fully comprehended by the spectacles of Ernest Lacau alone. Through his presentation Basu attempted understand the 'new policies' which raises a host of questions. What are the limits of such policies? Does its failure ensure the return of the traditional policies? Even if that happens, can the champions of traditional policies abandon the contents of populism? This is exactly

Electoral Democracy and the Nature of State Populism in West Bengal

Masud Islam

Masud Islam began his presentation by arguing that in the liberal democratic political discourse, populism has often been used pejoratively. However, off late, major scholars in the field of political theory regard populism as a governing principle of democratic political practice and the only substantive strategy of political mobilisation under conditions of representative democracy. Political parties and political movements irrespective of their ideological persuasions adopt populist rhetoric and articulate populist political agenda to appeal various tribalistic and heterogeneous sectors of the population against the antagonistic (internal) or popular mobilisation. In this paper, I aim, first to theoretically understand populism as a robust analytical concept in the domain of both electoral politics and governmental initiatives, which could throw light on the idea of state populism. From the recent experiences in Britain, one could argue that Left-wing populists are more socio-economically focused and more inclusive than the right-wing populists (March 2017). While agreeing with such an analysis, one could contend that in the current conjuncture, the left populists at least premise an alternative to neoliberalism. Thus, ruling populists, although on occasions, are prone to select set of neoliberal policies, they do not have a vision of transcending political capitalism. Moreover, left-wing populism is based on progressive, social, progressive policies, particularly, premising redistributive programmes as part of its ideological vocabulary. In contrast, the right-wing populism has been based mainly on fear, a fear of the immigrant with strong xenophobic character and the fact, that in all cases immigrants are presented as a threat to the security of the people while multiculturalism is perceived as being imposed by the élites against the popular will. Besides the academic study of left and right populisms (Mousavi 2018; Bobba and Duncan McDonnell 2016; Mudde 2017; Mery and Soto 2018) there is a marked literature wherein the recent works of Miller (2016) and Weyland (2018) that view all kinds of populism as a danger to democracy and those who think that populism might not be necessarily associated with the extremes (Gill 2018; Alberon and McDonnell 2009) in fact some argue that populism can be anti-bourgeois and may not be the most authoritarian targeting to conceptualise outright nationalism, racism and fascism (Sternthalis and Schrembs 2014). It must be pointed out that these academic studies tend to overlook the nature of state populism. State populism are to continue to the theoretical literature on populism like that of Ernesto Laclau (1977–1995), which proposes an oppositional politics but at the same time has the mark of Laclau's own normative project for a recall of leftist populism. However, how does a populist party sustain its rule by expanding the logic of equivalence while using the state? Various prominent forms of state populism existed in South Asia like that of the régime of Indira Gandhi in India in the late 1960s and early 1970s and孟加拉国 in early 1970s in Bangladesh. In the recent past we could also notice the state populism of Sheikh Hasina in Bangladesh and the Latin American state populisms. In this respect, this paper attempted to conceptualise the specific terms of state populism in West Bengal by examining the discursive articulatory practices of the All India Trinamool Congress, the ruling party in the Eastern Indian state of West Bengal led by Mamata Banerjee. While populism is regarded as the equivalence logic of the people against an antagonistic former including the state, the specific form of state populism as it exists today in India – electoral democracy – uses the state to challenge’s real or perceived enemy. In other words, the logic of anti-establishment becomes political challenge is being transformed into using the state apparatuses against an enemy. This gives a unique dimension to the populist configuration. The paper assessed the Trinamool’s peculiar form of state populism in response to the shifting populist politics of Mamata Banerjee, Janata Party that combines the xenophobic rhetoric against religious minorities. In contrast to such a ruling populist rhetoric, a counter-logic populism of Trinamool complements pluralist approach to politics along with distributional policies of giving massive dole to the poor under conditions of what could be described as neoliberalism with Indian characteristics. In doing such an exercise, the paper attempted to discern how state populism besides building the equivalence logic also accommodates democratic demands through a new logic of governance which although has a parallel to India’s logic of difference, and yet dissimilar to the differential logic. Thus, while populism in Laxmi’s works has the dual logic of equivalence and difference, the nature of state populism in West Bengal operates through a mixed logic of equivalence, difference and governance.

Amit Shukla pointed to a few problems with Basu’s paper. Firstly, it did not mention that it is talking about state populism. He pointed out that the notion of ‘people’ is an abstract category and can be as large and diverse as one needs it to be and should therefore be used carefully. He also pointed to the ambiguity with the concept of Trinamool’s slogan—Ma, Ma, Mamta! Excess Ma! Both Ma and Mamta are ambiguous. The party’s own motto is therefore ambiguous. Given the ambiguity to what extent can they then pursue their own government projects? Amit Shukla pointed to the theoretical richness of Muzaffar Issa’s paper. He concluded that both papers speak to each other. He further added that in the 2019 alliance by the WB chief Minister against a centrally managed CBI Dr. Islam accused them constituting henchmen outside for the public to see as an important example of populism in WB. The conduct of governance and bureaucracy in public during the protest was an attempt to make governance in its management, one of many examples that the state government has taken to ensure transparency. Chakraborty then asked “What is there so much of silence in critique of populism by the state government? Why is there a silence from the public?”

Ranabir Samaddar asked Basu why is it that in populist politics, there is so much emphasis on leadership? In Communist states, in China for example, the Chinese president could not be president for more than two terms, which has now been lifted. This anxiety about the person being a leader—~~is it~~ an anxiety from liberal (understandings), is the exception that there is a one-person party? Is it a liberal fear? Ranavir Singh pointed out that a more profound critique of the Left is needed: CPM was a symptom of a deeper darkness in the age of Bengal. There are also significant differences between Banerjee in 2011 and the Left Front in 1971. Md. Golam Islam responded that the Government coming to the road is indeed a liberal anxiety. We are already enmeshed in liberal governance, where an elected government is supposed to be different from street politics. Responding to Samaddar, Dr. Islam wondered if this era is a return of a Hobbesian space from a Lockean one? He added that, because of the expansion of media, the leader is always accessible. "A particular individual can actually be identified with an ideology." Mamata Banerjee is not just a leader, she is a family member. From government (to rule) she can do everything single-handedly. This is a form of democratic window management.<sup>10</sup> The Diktat strategy is another example of the omnipresent leader. He concluded that India's is inadequate in the ever-changing circumstances and contexts of populism. As a working paper it was to deal with something that many have not grappled with well—the questions of why and what breeding populism. He added that there are hardly any vibrant labor movements today and populism is an answer for many small workers who are working in unorganized establishments. In Mamata Banerjee's populism, Diktat does not rule from the city/town/ruler from the rural.

Programme on Future of the Liberal Order: Reflections on Politics and Policy in India

Anup Prakash

Prakash began by arguing that liberalism has been seen as a framework for organising the political process while protecting individual rights, liberty and equality of citizens. Alongside, liberalism may also be seen as a set of promoters, actors emerging from a complex, negotiated social contract in civil society, the acceptability of which has been underlined by the widespread support that it has found the world over. However, liberalism has also been characteristically cast of broken promises under the conditions of contemporary finance capital, belaying legitimate democratic concerns — about increased participation, better deliberation, or international equity for all sectors. Populism speaks to such belied expectations and constructs the more of a homogeneous popular will — without any opposition, with promises to deliver on these belied promises. The impact of such populist political projects is complex and far-reaching — from institutional ossification to the VINA of finance capitalism, and rising socio-political expectations in the face of increasing inequality. Prakash argues that research on populism has been contained within the liberal contexts of the discipline of Political Science with little focus in cognate disciplines. Consequently, understanding of the processes that underpin popular transformations, are not fully understood, least in the case of India. For instance, how does the neoliberal turn create conditions for the rise and growth of populism? How do both, together shape social outcomes? How does the coupling between information technology, finance capital and press of liberalism colonise the political space to create conditions for the emergence and growth of populism, and its implications for the liberal project? His paper examined some of these issues with the help of Indian material drawn from recent political patterns at the national level. To be able to examine the large phenomenon and to build some coherence and linkages, politics and policy debates on selected areas were taken to be the main focus.

Kanyashree Scheme: Popularity & Governmental Function

Raj De

De's research proposed to study the Kanyashree scheme as a conditional cash-transfer programme, introduced by the Mamata Banerjee government towards reducing school dropouts and underage marriage of girl children. The research historically focuses itself in the context of welfare schemes introduced for the upliftment of women and girl children across India. In the process the study further attempted to recognise the specific point of departure at which (constitutional) redistributive schemes for population groups (women being identified as one such group) become populist measures in the sense that while they claim to place the 'welfare' of the people at the centre, it then conceals functional as well as strategic mechanisms in the electoral agendas of ruling political parties. Given that on the one hand welfare schemes already entail the governmentalisation of certain democratic principles, including those of egalitarianism and justice. In the case of schemes for women one may think of how these are necessary in the governmentalisation of feminist politics and principles. How then do we characterise a popular scheme such as the Kanyashree as an active organ of a populist government? Through a study of the Kanyashree scheme the study attempted to arrive at an aspect of what populism may entail given that populism as a political practice has been historically difficult to define.

Vinod Bharosa asked if the tensions between liberalism and populism are indeed paradoxes? He argued that they are not, but rather that they are an expression of history today. As an example, he discussed how a few years ago a group in IIT Delhi (then students) condemned anti-homosexuality laws but they felt empowered to combat Pakistani aggression. Because of this, the discussant concluded that maybe IITIS had a paradox. He then discussed Max Weber, and how this frame was most likely how he came to view his wallahabadi movement seeing "every beginning nationalism emerging in Bismarck's Germany". At the same time a certain liberalism still existed in certain institutions in the country. He followed with two questions: The first is where are we to locate these tensions and convergences between liberalism and populism. And the second question is how do we analyse the institutional responses to persuade people about what is liberal and popular. Who are we able to persuade people? By "we" he meant people like himself who teach at universities about the right kind of politics to follow in a country like this. He advised Rudra to go on to deeper descriptions of her survey, and rest longer on the so-called peculiarities of the phenomenon described in her research. Further discussions concluded that papers both spoke to one another through the idea of populism but were also more specifically interrogate whether a particular scheme is a populist one or not.

Populism in the times of Competitive Democracy: Chhattisgarh as Case Study

Renu Roy

Chhattisgarh came into being in November 2000 when it was separated from Madhya Pradesh. The state is the tenth largest in area but its population is 22 million as per 2011 census; thus its population density is one of the lowest at 157 per square km as against the all India average of 307. With 41% of its land area under forest and vast mineral resources Chhattisgarh is a resources-rich state. It ranks second in production of coal, ranks third in production of iron ore and there are large deposits of other minerals like limestone, laterite etc. It is a power surplus state. It has good industrial base with steel, power and aluminum plants, cement factories and various other units. Though it is known as a rice basin its agricultural activities are by and large restricted to cultivation of paddy, maize, wheat etc. Ray pointed out that despite having a sound economic base and favourable land to people ratio, 48.1% population of Chhattisgarh was below poverty line as against the national average of 33%. In other words of the total population of 15.5 million there were 10.19 million poor people in the state. Since the yield from farming was never enough to sustain them throughout the year, a significant number of farmers had to migrate to other areas as unskilled and semi skilled labour and traditionally this became known as Biharpuri culture. In December, 2003 BJD won the election in Chhattisgarh and Raman Singh became the chief minister. Next year with the introduction of the Chhattisgarh Public Distribution System (Central) Order, 2004, Raman Singh started radically reforming the PDS of the state. Before that Fair Price Shops were mostly run by private owners and people were not genuine even when they officially allied for them. With that order Raman Singh cancelled license of all private run Fair Price Shops (FPS) and handed over the responsibility of running that to cooperative societies, gram panchayats, women's self help groups, primary level cooperative societies and forest protection groups. He increased the number of FPS from 849 to 1640. With the introduction of said Central Computerisation, the government could monitor the PDS system and bring in transparency. While efforts were made to sensitize the consumers in setting up one FPS in every gram panchayat the village committees were encouraged to monitor the distribution to plug pilferage. In fact all gram panchayats were engaged in keeping a strict vigil over the process of PDS. On the other hand the government started buying paddy directly from the farmers and also encouraging the millers to run the mills. Through the PDS, the government had tried to give rice at the rate of Rs. 2 to 30 lakh BPL families and at the rate of Rs. 14 to families > 30 lakh 'Antyodaya' families. As a result of that people of Chhattisgarh started fondly calling Raman Singh 'Chauhan raja baba' (One who gives rice). Ray argued that this role of 'Amarilal' coupled with other populist measures initiated by his helper Raman Singh rule the state for three consecutive terms. Raman Singh went ahead with his Reform of PDS programme not merely through administrative fiat but he successfully mobilised people around it. By handing over the running of the FPS to Panchayat and other local bodies and giving them responsibility of monitoring the supply and distribution of ration, he made them stakeholders. Thus a parallel system was created to the bureaucrats or, even, which eventually made the delivery system smooth and functional. It is also true that Raman Singh's Food Security Programme intended that of the Centre's Food Security Bill. It should be mentioned here that the Raman Singh government did not stop at reforming the PDS only when it also introduced some other populist programmes focussed on the poor. Yet, in the 2009 state assembly elections, Raman Singh and his party were swept out of power by Congress. Questions might be raised that his populist measures that kept him in power for 13 years might have lost their edge. But, the government's PDS system after the reform proved to be most efficient, transparent and people-friendly ones as acknowledged by Jeet Doss and others. Ray further pointed out that after its return to power for a third consecutive term, Raman Singh tried to make the much lauded food security programme more attractive by adding nutritional values. The state government started giving grants and other incentives to ration and midday-meal. Also, he announced a scheme under which around 10 lakh rural people would be given free mobile phones. But the Congress came out with a promise of complete waiver of debts for the farmers. Ray argued that it was too early to say that it was the main factor that saw Chauhan Waz Bada cornered in the hustings and finally routed in the election. But still it is important in the present context of recent Chhattisgarh election; then we are faced with another question: Is populist politics more likely to give rise to competitive bidding by the competing parties in a democracy? If so, then in a parliamentary democracy especially as it is unfolding in India the prospect of the end of ideology based politics is likely to end and be replaced by populist politics soon. Whether the parties of Left, Right and Centre are getting ready to give up their class caste based politics and would try to address the issues dear to the tribal masses, especially the poorest sections of the society, and reposition themselves accordingly, is to be seen. But if the present trend is any indication then the pressure on them to change their position is only growing. The paper tried to address an additional question: What is the difference between a populist measure and a welfare measure? How does one draw a line between these two? It cannot be denied that while welfare programmes have got moral approval of the society as a duty of the State towards its people, the populist programmes initiated by the state have always evoked some consternation among the urban elite. It seems that the very word populism has a derogatory meaning. According to the Oxford Dictionary the word populism means "A political approach that attempts to appeal to ordinary people, often (but not necessarily)

by established elite groups? Ray concluded by asking, does it mean that only those welfare schemes are termed as 'Populist' that are targeted to address the poor people's concerns?

Populism and Identity Politics: The Case of Purulia, West Bengal

Nirmal Kumar Mahato

Mahato began his presentation by arguing that in populist political ideas the people's identity gradually received importance. In the idea of secularism various types of shared identities among different groups of people are incorporated. During Mamata Banerjee's rule in West Bengal various populist programmes such as distribution of cycles to students, distribution of free A.R.R.D. schemes for peasants, folk artists, artisans, Bihari folk have been introduced. The introduction of Samaj language in the primary level classes for the Maghsudians of the Santals, patronage of Korkhill language movement by Kurni Mahato artiste encouraged the identities of Adivasis and caste groups which later paved the way for the rise of identity politics. Due to the weakness in the implementation of the populist programme, economic elites became richer and the Hindutva forces of population successfully marginalised the Adivasis and caste groups who are becoming Adibal. Thus this paper attempted to explore the complexities and limitations of populist policies and the emergence of identities of different social groups in Purulia.

Reexamining Edwardian Population in Postcolonial India: Considerations around D.N. Mitra's 'Population Policy' & 'Migrant Workers' in West Bengal Beyond

Anu Ghosh

Anu Ghosh began his paper with a reference to Edward Shils who popularised 'populism' in 1951 as a concept by broadening it to denote anti-elitist trends in US society in general (and not specifically in connection with the People's Party). The concept Ghosh argued has travelled a long way. Quite literally, it has found application in other countries and continents and more importantly for us in this postcolonial third world context. The term of the term populism has widened so much so that Margaret Canney, one of the foremost commentators on populism, has had to painstakingly retain the connoting relevance of his analytical purchase even as she has had to disaggregate the term into a seven-layered typology. Come by this typology, three of these seven types of populism can be grouped under the general rubric of agrarian populism: i.e. farmers' radicalism, peasant movements and intellectual agrarian socialism. The remaining four similarly can be subsumed under the umbrella of political populism, representing popular dictatorship populism, Democracy, reactionary populism and politicalised populism. Obviously, these are meant to serve as heuristic, and not historical, types, since in reality these categories betray a great degree of overlap. To take the example of D.N. Dhanagare's study of the farmers' movement in western India, especially Maharashtra, from the 1980s to 2014 (Peasant, Pol Power: Farmers' Movements in Maharashtra 1980-2014), we find ourselves on the basis of such archival sources and informed field studies where the univocal category of 'Agrarian populism' is woven wary and well into the fabric of political populism. Structuring his study in the spaces between populism as an ideology on the one hand and as political power within the democratic state structure, on the other, Dhanagare, in fact, explores the complex crosslinking between populist ideology and mass participation. How well and in line at the findings? Sometimes it fared well, sometimes, not. Against the backdrop of mixed electoral fortunes, the popular emerges as the democratic atom that underpins the book's chief problematic. Hence, in my reading then, comes to constitute the popular's介在between Dhanagare's meta-historical ideology and political power. From this perspective, Ang Ghosh attempted to split Dhanagare's narrative in the west with a semi-local similar story from the east, but in the latter case one which is focussed on the political career of one man, who became emblematic of a movement: Maithili Singh. Hamed Khan, Bhaeshankar. Here too, in the case of the Marathi Janata, we find considerable similarity of arrangement and opposition between apparent binaries like of ideology and political power; intellectual agrarian socialism and the burgeoning political populism; peasant mass participation and electoral populism, and so on.

Ang Ghosh noted that the Ray's paper provided a comprehensive breakdown of the Chhattisgarh state and how Raman Singh could mobilize his popular measures through subtilities intended to the post-strategies of governance for a long time. He found Raman Singh's electoral defeat after three consecutive terms as predictable. He also noted how Marathi movements remained peripheries of Chhattisgarhi politics to the mainstream Marathi groups, although they were very poor, even though they counts. For him, the conflict was important. He also pointed out how there has been a constant tension between Marathi movement and populist dimension in the state. It was noted that Ghosh's paper attempted to understand agrarian populism in a larger perspective with focus to the interactivity of agrarian populism and its upper layer. In fact, apart from this, formation was changed after the great revolution. Ghosh was asked if gender was a relevant category in his research. He responded that only forms of a patriarchal religion were addressed in these movements while referring to Hindu metaphors used. He added that the spectrum should be further discussed and he left this category like village and town and the limitation of time. He argued that Maulana Bhastaki had a completely different paradigm since he regarded human beings more important than ideology. Ravi Sekhri asked Ghosh about the interaction between political economy and populism. He raised his concern over how other sections of agrarian protests could force people to express their political economy. He argued that market in the dominant discourse cannot allow that market can't return a subject at all and hence he argued. Islam asked Ray about the idea of governance. He was sceptical about the question of limitation and he firmly argued about how BJP connects people through different interests and varied political narratives. He pointed out how an established system can not necessarily have alternatives. Mattox responded that the theory of sympathy towards Athavas focused them to earn legitimacy whereas Trinamool Congress could not attain legitimacy with the general will of the people. Purna Choudhury also commented that there should be efforts to find a way of doing populism and the focus should be given to democratic populism as strategy and model, especially.
